The Plymouth Brethren owe their origin to two men—Anthony Norris Groves, of Exeter, and Mr. Bellett, a Dublin barrister. Groves, born in 1795, had been a dentist first at Plymouth and then at Exeter, where he accumulated a large fortune. About 1825, when he was at the age of 30, he entered Trinity College, Dublin, and came into contact with Bellett and John Nelson Darby. In 1826 Groves attended a Bible reading, and said to Bellett: "It appears to me from Scripture that believers, meeting together as disciples of Christ, are free to break bread together as their Lord admonished them, and, in as far as the practice of the apostles can be a guide, every Lord's day should be set apart for this remembrance of the Lord's command." This suggestion was at once carried out by himself and his friends at Dublin. This was the origin of the Plymouth Brethren. Groves and Darby had scruples about the doctrine and discipline of the Church. Groves relinquished all intention of taking orders; Darby did not. At this time two remarkable men appeared upon the scene—Edward Irving and Francis William Newman. In 1827 a prophecy meeting was established at Albury Park, Surrey, and at Powerscourt House, near Bray, Wicklow, Ireland. These meetings continued on to 1833. At the last meeting at Powerscourt, Mr. George Muller, of Bristel, was present. He was leader of what was called the Separatist movement in England. He had been a Baptist, but left that body in search of a visibly united Christian communion, free from the bondage of tests and subscriptions, which seemed to him the cause of all the mischief. He went to Powerscourt and established a meeting for the breaking of bread, open to all who loved Christ. Lady Powerscourt embraced these views and seceded from the Church. Darby practically abandoned his clerical position in 1833, and directed his efforts henceforward to the building up of the new society. At Bristol a large congregation gathered to the ministry of Mr. Muller, and at present there are three congregations there. He admits to communion all who profess faith in Christ, come from where they may.

THE readers of our paper will be interested in knowing that the proprietors of "Warner's Log Cabin Remedies" will pay $371.21 in cash for the best answer to the question: "What is the hole for that is in the outside of the chimney of the old-fashioned log cabin, as represented in the trade-mark of 'Warner's Log Cabin Remedies?'" A pamphlet with a picture of such a log cabin can be procured at any drug store. The answers must be sent by mail to H. H. Warner & Co., proprietors of the celebrated "Warner's SAFE CURE," Rochester, N. Y., before April 10th, 1888. But one answer from each contestant will be considered. It must be signed with the real name, giving post-office address, and must state that the party has purchased and used at least one of the following remedies: Warner's Log Cabin Sarsaparilla, Warner's Log Cabin Hops and Buchu Remedy, Warner's Log Cabin Cough and Consumption Remedy, Warner's Log Cabin Extract, Warner's Log Cabin Liver Pills, Warner's Log Cabin Rose Cream (for catarrh, etc.), Warner's Log Cabin Scalpine (for the scalp and hair), Warner's Log Cabin Plasters. The answers will be referred to an impartial committee for decision, which will be announced April 10th, 1888. Letters of inquiry will not be answered.

Nuns Who Never See Men.

The Via Merulina Convent, in Rome, will remain in the possession of the nuns until the death of the last of them, when the property will go to thecity. The sixteen remaining nuns, who are called the Sepulte Vive, are still in the monastery, where they once received a visit from the Princess of Wales. These nuns, some of them ladies of noble families, observe a very strict rule. Once entering the convent they never leave it alive. They never see men, not even the priest who says mass in the chapel. The altar is screened off, and they can just see the elevation of the host. Through a small aperture they receive holy communion. Iron gratings and a linen veil guard the small openings through which they make confession. They never undress or repose, but spend half the night in prayer, and keep, except in cases of extreme illness, a perpetual absence from heat. They make almost everything they use, even to shoes and medicines. If a parent of one of these nuns dies, the announcement is not made to the nun herself, but in general terms it is said that one of them has lost by death a father or a mother, as the case may be.—London Court.

Leave hope behind,
All ye who enter here

So ran the dire warning which Dante read on the portals of the Inferno. So runs the cruel verdict of your friends if you are overtaken by the first symptoms of that terrible disease, consumption. "Leave hope behind! Your days are numbered!" And the struggle against death is given up in despair. But while there is life there is hope! Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has cured hundreds of cases worse than yours; and it will cure you, if taken in time. But delay is dangerous. No power can restore a wasted lung; the "Golden Medical Discovery," however, can and will arrest the disease.

The Consistent Husband.

"Mary, this house is as cold as a barn. Why don't you keep the fire going and make the place more comfortable?" "You are very sensitive to a little cold. Where have you been for the past hour?" "I was up on the roof so I could have a better view of the dog-fight over in Grigsby's yard.—Nebraska State Journal.

"Whatever is is write," said the weary editor of a country newspaper, whose patent outside had failed to appear on time.

Abel Finkle, a well-known farmer of Sidney, who had a stroke of paralysis on the top of a straw-stack on Tuesday night, died yesterday.

HOPE FOR CONSUMPTIVES!

A New Theory of the Dread Disease Which Seems Very Sensible.

In fifty per cent. of the cases, consumption is only the symptom of some other disease!

The disease, in such cases, cannot be cured until the cause, whatever it is, is removed.

More than half the victims of consumption have albumen in their water.

"What does this indicate?"

Albumen cannot appear in what escapes from the body, if the organs which take the water from the blood are healthy.

We drink water in large quantities every day. This water goes through the body and washes away the waste matter and decay of the system, and takes it to the kidneys. If these organs are healthy, this waste in solution in the water is removed by them. If not, the natural action is reversed, and, instead of removing the waste that poisonous stuff remains n the blood, but the real life-giving element or the albumen escapes.

Fancy the effect!

This uric acid waste is a rank poison, and attacks the weakest organ first. The Brompton Hospital of London, England, shows in its reports that over 52 per cent. of the victims of consumption are really victims of kidney disease, the lung trouble being shown by the presence of albumen in the blood to be but the indication of kidney derangement. The real cause of pulmonary troubles being so authoritatively shown to be faulty, even though unsuspected action of the kidneys, explains why, in order to master the dreaded consumption, one must rid the blood of the uric acid irritant, which inflames and burns up the lung substance. For this purpose there is nothing equal to that great specific, Warner's safe cure. This remedy has won the favor of medical men all over the world, purely on its merits. We have no doubt that if the kidneys are kept in natural action, consumption and a great many other diseases, caused by uric acid, will not only be cured, but will be prevented.

J. W. Westlake, of Mt. Vernon, Ohio, had a sister residing in Michigan who was thought surely to be going with consumption. She took ten bottles of Warner's safe cure, which he sent her, and he says, "That was the last I heard of her consumption." Thousands of such cases are developed every day.

Dip your finger in acid every day, and it soon festers and is destroyed. Send acid-poisoned blood through the lungs every second and they soon give way.

This, then, is the condition of things that always precedes consumption: First, weakened kidneys; second, retained uric acid, poisoning the blood; the development of disease in the lungs by the irritant acids passing through them. Then there is a little cough in the morning, soon, thick yellow matter is spit up, followed by loss of flesh and strength with dreadful night sweats; and when the patient goes to his school physician for help he is put on cod liver oil, which his stomach, weakened also by uric acid in the blood, cannot digest. Because there is no pain present in the kidneys, the patient does not think they are affected, but the kidney acid is doing its work every minute, every hour, day and night, and by and by the disease of the lungs has advanced until pus is developed, then come hemorrhages, and at last the glassy stare of the eyes, which denote that the end is near.

A post-mortem examination of such cases shows that the terrible uric acid has completely destroyed the substance of the lung.

It is impossible to cure lung diseases, the blood is poisoned with uric acid.

A Dream of Fair Women.

Tennyson in his exquisite poem dreams of a long procession of lovely women of ages past. This is all very well, but the laureate would have done the world a greater service if he had only told the women of the present how they could improve their health and enhance their charms. This he might easily have done by recommending the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. Health is the best friend of beauty, and the innumerable ills to which women are peculiarly subject, its worst enemies. Long experience has proven that the health of womankind and the "Favorite Prescription" walk hand in hand, and are inseparable. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

The Crushed Parent.

Offensive breath vanishes with the use of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy.

Two Evils, the Least Chosen.

Agitation may have its advantages, but its injurious effects are not a patch on the evil that railroad monopoly has done, and s doing, for us.—Winnipeg Sun.

Safe, Sure and Painless.

What a world of meaning this statement embodies. Just what you are looking for, is it not? Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor—the great sure-pop corn extractor—acts in this way. It makes no sore spots; safe, acts speedily and with certainty; sure and mildly, without inflaming the parts; painlessly. Do not be imposed upon by imitations or substitutes.

Captain Baldry, of the steam whaler Orea, has just returned to San Francisco from a voyage in which he killed thirty-five whales, the largest catch on record. Twenty-eight of these—all the ship could carry—were stowed and yielded 2,800 barrels of oil and 48,000 pounds of bone. The catch was valued at $66,800.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtanedof druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

A Child Thrown to Wolves.

The severe cold of this winter has brought out large packs of wolves all over Hungary. An Hungarian county court judge, returning home from Grosswardein in a sleigh, last Friday, was beset by a ravenous pack, which terrified his horses and caused him to be thrown out of the sleigh. The coachman, without heeding his master, drove madly on, and the magistrate was completely devoured. Nothing but a few bones and pieces of cloth were found on the road when search was subsequently made for him. Another horrible case is reported, namely, that of a peasant who, pursued by wolves, flung his boy, aged 13, out of the sleigh to these animals, and thereby saved himself. On reaching his village this wretched man surrendered himself to the police.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "curesall," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The subject of "Independent Journalism" introduces one to a wide realm for discussion. There are so many stand points from which it can be viewed, too, and so many interpretations or definitions connected with the word when applied to newspapers, that one must be a prophet or the son of a prophet in order to thread its mazes without becoming seriously, if not hopelessly, entangled. If we look at the question from the Dundalk Herald's standpoint, then the number of party papers becomes beautifully small, while that of the independent press assumes vast proportions. The "radical partyism of the local press, which clamors for a party and expects all its readers to follow its dictates" does not really exist in either of the hemispheres. What editor however extreme his views expects all his readers to follow his dictates!

According to the Herald (perhaps not just in so many words) all papers may be classed as independent which occasionally disagree as to the utility or necessity of certain minor questions in the policy of the party with whom they claim allegiance. In that case, there are very few papers which are not independent, and this explains the position taken by our esteemed confrere more clearly than the arguments advanced in a former issue. But an important question yet remains undecided, viz., are the opinions of the Herald, touching this point, in harmony with those held by the "independent press" generally? If they are, then there is very little room for discussion in so far as THE ADVANCE is concerned at any rate, for it sometimes disagrees with the Government. If they are not, however, the question arises, wherein lies the difference?

The Herald thinks a man should not make up his mind definitely as to the party he will vote for until the elections are sprung." Indeed. You argue, then, that he should not read the newspapers and post himself in the current literature of the day? Otherwise he would be apt to learn enough to enable him to decide which party to support long before the "elections are sprung." If a party has a policy, it doesn't usually hide it under a bushel or a candlestick "until elections are sprung." There are questions which the wisest heads could scarcely fathom if they postponed the serious study of the same until the hurly burly of an election campaign swept over the country arousing the prejudices and passions of people to fever heat. The worst time to look for honest information or to choose which party you will support, is after "the elections are sprung."

The editor of the Flesherton ADVANCE has given up chewing tobacco and has fallen back on gum. Bruce Herald. Perhaps our esteemed contemporary will add to the above canard by stating that the ADVANCE man discovered America when Julius Caesar was emperor of Persia!

Toronto may be a great city and all the rest of it, but if any more of our local contemporaries publish that play-on-the names of Toronto newspapers item in their local or editorial columns as original matter, we shall feel like introducing them to our Spring Poet annihilator, or Bill Nye's elevator.

We pity that poor unfortunate Municipal Act. If it were mortal, we verily believe we could shed tears over it. Every session of the Ontario Legislature witnesses a large number of gallant efforts to add to the cantankerous burden under which it already groans in deepest anguish—and still they come! Already this session we have counted eleven attempts to "Amend the Municipal Act." The Lord only knows how many more egotistical asses will try their hands at butchering it before the close of the session, in their mad efforts to cover themselves with glory.

A letter found its way into the columns of THE ADVANCE last week, above the cognomen, "Lover of Justice." It contained a personal attack, which was, and is, contrary to the rules which have governed our correspondence department for some time. In the hurry of going to press, the letter was overlooked. In order, however, to prevent mistakes of this kind in future, we might just say, that letters reflecting upon any person will only be published in this journal over the real name of the writer, unless they come from the pens of our regularly authorized correspondents. These latter are well known and reliable gentlemen—some of whom have for years been regular and prized contributors. We like a manly man—one who will stand up face to face with his opponent and exchange blows like a true Briton: yes, and one who does not conceal himself and administer stabs in the dark. Come out into the light, Mr. "Lover-of-Justice," and "walk into" Mr. Long the manly way Mr. Buckingham is doing. And if you do say hard things, and, perhaps unintentionally, distort facts, you will at least get credit for manliness. You should learn a useful lesson from Messrs. Long and Buckingham in this respect.

Maxwell School Matters.

To the Editor of The Advance.

Dear Sir, As I had about made up my mind when sending my last letter on School Matters in this place to remain silent, it may seem out of place to again take up the controversy. But after the statements made by James Buckingham in his effusions of last week. I merely wish to say that any charges or statements that I have made against him I am quite prepared to substantiate by good reliable evidence, nevertheless the twisting and turning he has made to evade the matter I am aware that to outsiders the controversy may be of little interest. But here where the facts are well known there can be no doubt as to the verdict.

But behold just over in another lot I hear the braying of an animal of another species and in the end says he is a "lover of justice." I do not attempt a reply, it is simply a nobody in ambush trying to ambush himself and I shall allow him to do so to his heart's content as such garble as he has started out with does not in any way effect me, and by the time he gets through others will be as much ashamed of him as he is of his name.

W. Long,
Maxwell.

THE GREAT HEALTH RESTORER,
Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.
Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN
Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, or any weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SPECIFIC IS USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, restlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excesses—impotency, nutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Farmer's Institute Meeting at Markdale.

A meeting of Centre Grey Farmer's Institute was held in Markdale on Monday last. One o'clock was the hour announced for the commencement, but it was shortly after two before the chair was taken by the Vice President, Mr. D. R. Ellis, of Euphrasia township, assisted by Mr. Thos. Kells, President. The latter addressed a few sensible remarks to those present regarding the utility of such institutes and the necessity for farmers banding themselves together. The Secretary, Mr. J. I. Graham, then read letters from several gentlemen, regretting their absence from the meeting.

A post card from the Central Farmer's Institute, containing the following questions, was then produced and read to the assembly:

(1). Are you in favor of placing the management of the Farmer's Institute in the hands of the Executive of the Farmer's Central Institute.

(2). Do you favor the erection of an Agricultural Hall in the city of Toronto for the use of farmers for exhibitions and sales?

(3). Do you think Ensilage is necessary to increase the supply of succulent food in winter.

The first question caused a warm debate, in which the opinion was expressed by Dr. Sproule, M. P., and others, that the Institute would be unwise in committing itself until it had been ascertained whether benefit or the opposite was likely to accrue from the adoption of such a course. A resolution in harmony with this view of the question was then submitted and carried.

The second question was answered in the affirmative after very little talk.

Question number three brought Dr. Sproule to his feet, when the assembled farmers were treated to a very interesting address in which the peculiar process by which Ensilage becomes a cheap and nutritious food for stock was explained fully. The Doctor also spoke of the importance of having more convenient buildings for the care of stock. In many cases, buildings were so isolated and badly arranged, that the services of three men were often necessary where one could do the same amount of work with less hard labor under favorable circumstances. He also spoke strongly in favor of improving our stock.

Messrs. Thorpe Wright, Thos. Kells, J. I. Graham, D. R. Ellis, G. Stewart, jr., and others discussed the suggestions of the Dr. in an interesting manner.

Dr. Carson read a profound scientific paper, relating principally to rust in grain stalks. As it will be published in THE ADVANCE in full shortly, we need not particularize just now, further than to say it was well received, and elicited words of approval.

The Editor of THE ADVANCE gave a paper on "Farmers and Farming."

Mr. Wm. Brown, Division Court Clerk at Markdale, next took the platform. He complimented Dr. Christoe highly on the excellence of his paper, but thought it was rather deep and scientific for the grasp of the average mind. He was then proceeding to address the farmers on Commercial Union, when Chairman Ellis objected, on the grounds that that was a question out of which considerable political capital was being made and could not, according to a previous understanding, be discussed at regular meetings of the Institute. Mr. J. I. Graham pointed out that the previous action of the Institute alluded to by Mr. Ellis had no reference to meetings such as the present, where there were no representatives of the Government present. Mr. Kells spoke in a similar strain; but Mr. Brown gracefully submitted to the ruling of the Chairman and expressed his approval of the course that gentleman had pursued. It was then tacitly understood, that the question would come up for a full and free discussion at a special meeting, the date of which has not yet been set.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykens, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headaches, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days, and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Fatherland and Mother Tongue.

Our fatherland! and would'st thou know
Why we should call it "fatherland?"
It is that Adam, here below,
Was made of earth by nature's hand
And He, our Father, made of earth,
Hath peopled earth on every hand,
And we, in memory of his birth,
Do call our country "fatherland."

And first in Eden's bowers, they say,
No sound of speech had Adam caught.
But whistled like a bird all day,
And may be 'twas for want of thought;
But nature, with resistless laws,
Made Adam soon surpass the birds,
She gave him lovely Eve because
He'd a wife—they must have words

And so the native land, I hold,
By male descent is proudly mine;
The language, as the tale hath told,
Was given in the female line.
And thus we see on either hand,
We name our blessings whence they've sprung,
We call our country fatherland,
We call our language mother tongue.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER VIII.

The New Year's eve ball at Fairholme Court was always looked forward to with eager anticipation, both by the house party and by the young people of the neighborhood. This year it was to be an especially brilliant affair, for Lady Fairholme wished it to be a kind of public announcement of the engagement of Sir Gilbert's niece to Major Stuart.

The engagement was not to be a long one—there was no reason why it should be so. Major Stuart's long leave expired in April, and he wished to rejoin his regiment, then quartered at Aldershot, with his wife; so it was decided that the marriage should take place on St. Valentine's Day, and, at Shirley's own request, it was to be a quiet wedding.

Sir Hugh Glynn and Major Stuart were still Sir Gilbert's guests, and the former seemed to have renewed his flirtation with Alice, who received his attentions very favorably. The weather had become much colder, and there had been some skating; but on the 30th of December a rapid thaw set in, to Ruby Capel's horror, but to the undoubted satisfaction of all those who were to drive any distance to the ball.

Not only was Fairholme Court full from garret to basement with visitors, but Sir Hugh had placed Maxwell at Lady Fairholme's disposal; and he was to entertain there for three or four days a number of bachelor guests who were quite necessary, Alice declared, to make the ball completely successful, and who were to drive and ride over from Maxwell on New Year's eve.

"Our house is unfortunately not made of caoutchouc," Alice said laughingly "we cannot accommodate every one, but I think you might let them entertain themselves, Sir Hugh, and not leave us to our own devices here."

"I am afraid that it would not be very courteous, Miss Fairholme," Sir Hugh answered, smiling. "So Miss Ross must forgive me for carrying off Guy to-morrow evening," he added, turning to Shirley, into whose fair pale cheeks the color came, as it usually did, greatly to her own annoyance, when he addressed her.

"I dare say Shirley will get quite enough of Major Stuart's society in the future," Alice said carelessly. "But you are not going until the afternoon, Sir Hugh? None of these tiresome men are coming till the 6 o'clock train; and you can ride over in much less than an hour."

"Oh, yes, we will put the evil hour off as long as possible!" Sir Hugh answered rather absently, for his eyes were following Shirley as she moved down the great hall where this conversation took place, and which was set apart for dancing on the following evening.

Those days which had been such happy ones to Guy and Shirley had been quite the reverse to Sir Hugh. It was impossible but that, loving Shirley as he did, selfishly perhaps, but yet passionately, he should suffer, seeing her love for and perfect trust in Guy; and once or twice he had said to himself that he could bear it no longer, that he would go away and put the wide seas between him and her, and let himself no longer be tormented by the sight of the happiness which was denied to him. But he could not leave Fairholme. It was better to see Shirley at any price than to lose sight of her altogether; besides, he always hoped, even against hope, that something would happen, and that after all Shirley would be his.

So he lingered, hating Guy, loving and hating Shirley, and despising himself most of all for the weakness which made him the slave of a girl who had no thought for him, and whose whole heart was given to another.

To a man who has been all his life unusually successful, who has never known what defeat is, and who has had his every wish fulfilled, his every desire gratified, the very idea of a repulse in anything upon which he has set his mind is quite sufficient to act as an incentive, and to urge him on to further exertion; and this was the case with Sir Hugh Glynn. It might have been, that, if Shirley had fallen a victim, Sir Hugh's passion would have wearied, and finally died a natural death; but the girl's indifference, and above all her love for Guy, excited in him an eager desire to conquer that indifference and win that love.

Hitherto Sir Hugh Glynn's life, although not a useful or noble one, had been comparatively harmless, and his faults had been negative ones; but now the latent cruelty and passion of his nature had sprung suddenly into life, and the death-blow of his friendship for Guy was struck. Who was Guy Stuart, he thought passionately, that he should win without an effort a love for which he would have given his life? Had it not been for him, Shirley would have loved him. Other women had done so, why should not she? He was handsome and pleasing and wealthy, while Guy Stuart was anything but an eligible. And yet he had won Shirley Ross!

Must he give her up? Must he leave Guy in undisturbed possession of this treasure he coveted so greatly? Must he stand by and see their happiness, and smile and congratulate them, unmoved and indifferent? He could not do it—it was impossible. He would have her yet. If fair means failed, he would try foul! There was no baseness to which he would not stoop to win the woman he loved with so fatal a passion! There was no treachery too great to practice, if by it he could gain her for his own!

He was thinking thus in the solitude of his own room on the day on which he and Guy were to leave the Court. Luncheon was over, and he had left the rest of the party in the oak parlor, where they were busy with some of the preparations for the morrow. The girls had been unpacking the dainty little programmes which had just arrived from Edinburgh, and they had been chatting merrily about them with Guy, Mr. Rivers, and some of the other gentlemen at the Court. Lady Fairholme and the older ladies had taken refuge in one of the smaller drawing-rooms, leaving the young people to their own devices; and Sir Hugh had left the oak-parlor, unable any longer to bear the misery and unrest and wild longing which burned in his heart and brain. He was in just the state of mind to succumb to temptation, and to him at that moment and in that mood the temptation came.

The rooms which Sir Hugh occupied at Fairholme Court were a bedroom and dressing room on the first floor, opening on to a long picture gallery; and, as he paced restlessly up and down, he could hear his servant moving about in the dressing-room adjoining, busied with his master's packing. But Sir Hugh was too irritable just then to bear any disturbance, noiseless as the man's movements were; and he called out sharply—

"Latreille!"

The man appeared on the threshold of the door between the two rooms, calm and quiet as usual.

"I am here, Sir Hugh," he said, in his even voice, his keen eye noting the disquiet on his master's haggard face.

"What the deuce are you doing in there?" demanded Sir Hugh irritably.

"I was packing up, Sir Hugh."

"Let the packing wait—I want to be alone," said Sir Hugh, in the same impatient manner, but the man lingered.

"Can I get you anything, Sir Hugh?" he asked respectfully. "I am afraid you are ill, sir."

"Ill? What put that in your head?" returned the baronet, as he walked over to the looking-glass. But the pale, haggard face he saw there startled himself, and he laughed a little bitter laugh. "By Jove, I don't wonder at your thinking so!" he said carelessly. "I am afraid Scotland, and especially Fairholme Court, does not agree with me."

"You look as if you needed a change of some kind, Sir Hugh. May I get you some brandy?"

"So you think brandy is the universal panacea?" Sir Hugh said, with another little laugh.

"I have found it very efficacious, Sir Hugh," Latreille answered, with the same unmoved impassive countenance.

"Have you? Then bring me some, and some soda-water; or make me one of your 'pick-me-ups,' if you like. That is one of your accomplishments, and you have several."

"I have knocked about the world a good deal, Sir Hugh, and I have acquired some knowledge everywhere," was the quiet answer, as the man left the room to fetch the required restorative.

When he returned, he found that Sir Hugh had thrown himself into an arm-chair and was lying back, with his eyes closed wearily. As the baronet took the glass from the man's hand their eyes met, Sir Hugh's keen and questioning, the servant's meaning and significant.

"I don't suppose you are more honest than your fellows, Latreille," Sir Hugh said coolly.

"I don't suppose I am, Sir Hugh. I do not profess to be so. I only deem myself equally honest," was the unmoved answer.

"Oh, you profess so much rectitude then!" said the baronet, with a laugh. "I wonder if there is anything in the world you would not do for money, Latreille?"

"Very little, Sir Hugh, except what would give me into the hands of the law. I have a wholesome fear of that."

Sir Hugh laughed.

"Short of what is punishable by law then," he said calmly, "there is no treachery you would not commit, no lie too great for you to utter to serve your own ends?"

"Or yours, Sir Hugh," replied Latreille promptly, with a slight emphasis on the words. "You always may count upon my devotion, sir."

"I suppose you think I would pay well for it," said his master, with a slight sneer.

"Just so, Sir Hugh," the man answered, with a fleeting smile, which his master did not see.

"You are honest so far," said the baronet lightly; then, after a pause, he added, in the same careless manner, "What do they say in the servant's hall about Miss Ross's engagement, Latreille?"

"They say, Sir Hugh, that the young lady might have gone further and not fared worse," was the prompt reply; and a dark flush rose slowly in the handsome haggard face of the man who listened.

"And they say too, Sir Hugh," the man continued, noting his master's emotion, "that Miss Ross has come to the same conclusion herself."

"Indeed! How is that?"

"Miss Fairholme's maid, Sir Hugh, is a countrywoman of mine," answered the valet coolly, "and she has overheard her mistress talking of the engagement; and, from what she heard, Mademoiselle Delphine is of opinion that Miss Ross would not be sorry to undo what she has done."

"What grounds has Delphine for such an opinion?" Sir Hugh asked, in the same careless manner, but with a swift eager gleam in his blue eyes which did not escape the valet's notice.

"Miss Ross has always wished for wealth, Sir Hugh. She has no fortune herself, I understand, and she has a brother to whom she is tenderly attached. Major Stuart is not wealthy, Sir Hugh."

"Still Miss Ross has accepted him."

"Miss Ross, I need hardly tell you, Sir Hugh, is rather unhappily situated. She is dependent on Sir Gilbert, and she is so extremely beautiful that"—the man smiled slightly—"it is quite possible her beauty might interfere with her ladyship's plans for Miss Fairholme's establishment. Miss Ross's life may not have been such a happy one, Sir Hugh, that, unless she were sure of a better offer, she would feel justified in refusing Major Stuart's."

"A very prudent young lady," Sir Hugh remarked, trying to keep up the affectation of indifference, yet not succeeding so as to escape Latreille's notice.

"Besides," continued Latreille meaningly, "Miss Ross is a very enthusiastic admirer of beauty, and Major Stuart is not an Adonis."

"You speak as if you had college education, Latreille," Sir Hugh remarked.

"I had good opportunities," the man replied modestly.

"Then Delphine thinks that it is very likely Miss Ross wearies of her engagement?"

"Mademoiselle Delphine thinks she will do so, Sir Hugh."

"And what is your opinion, most sagacious of valets?"

"I think, Sir Hugh, that before very long Miss Ross, if she is as sensible as she is beautiful, will be greatly obliged to any one who will release her from her engagement; and—"

"Well?" said Sir Hugh, as the man hesitated.

"And I think," Latreille continued slowly and meaningly, "that if I cared for a young lady in Scotland I should put it out of her power to throw me over."

"How?" Sir Hugh asked quickly, betraying his eagerness, as he sat up in his chair and faced his servant.

"By marrying her out of hand, Sir Hugh."

"That is easier said than done, Latreille," Sir Hugh rejoined, a disappointed shadow flitting over his face.

"Not in this country, Sir Hugh."

"Not in this country?" interrogated Sir Hugh, in a puzzled tone; and then, as he looked up he found Latreille's blue eyes with an intense significance in their earnest gaze fixed upon his face.

For a moment master and man looked at each other in silence; then Sir Hugh said quietly—

"I am very dense, I am afraid, but I don't understand. Just explain, will you, Latrielle, how it is easier in this country than in any other to put it out of a lady's power to jilt you?"

"It is very easy, Sir Hugh, seeing that we are neither in France, where it is as difficult to get married as to undo that marriage, nor in England, where it is rather easier to undo than to do; but," he added slowly, "we are in Scotland."

"What difference does that make?"

"Just all the difference, Sir Hugh."

There was another pause, and then Sir Hugh said, with some irritation—

"Just explain yourself, Latreille. What are you beating about the bush for?"

"I will explain myself willingly, Sir Hugh, if you will spare me half-an-hour. I could not undertake in less time to tell you the story of Miss Ross's mother, which will be the best explanation I can give you."

"The story of Miss Ross's mother!" Sir Hugh repeated slowly.

"Yes, Sir Hugh. Can you spare me so much time? Half-an-hour will suffice."

"Take an hour then," Sir Hugh said hurriedly. "But come to the point."

There was a pretty French pendule on the mantel-piece in Sir Hugh's room, and, as he glanced at it impatiently, he saw that it marked the half hour after three. At 5 o'clock, when a servant came up to say that the carriage was waiting to take Sir Hugh and Major Stuart to Maxwell, the baronet was still in earnest conference with his valet; but Latreille had finished his explanation, and they were busy with the application of Mrs. Ross's story—that story which her daughter had never heard.

CHAPTER IX.

Goldenheart sat in the dropping of leaves
That fell like a shower of gold,
And thought "When a lover his song of love weaves, Pray how shall his merit be told"
Him will I put to some desperate test,
And so shall I gather who loveth me best.
Goldenheart dear, Goldenheart dear
Thus pondered of lovers who yet should appear.

Shirley Ross's rich sweet voice rang gayly through the oak parlor, and Ruby Capel looked up laughingly from her crewel as she listened to the song.

Half a dozen girls were grouped about the room in various attitudes of rest and ease, and the fire was blazing up cheerily, casting a pleasant red glow over the polished oaken paneling and wainscoting, and the graceful figures lounging about on sofas and arm chairs; and Ruby herself looking like some bright foreign bird in her quaint tea-gown of some gay Eastern-looking material, was sitting on the hearth-rug a la Turque, making a pretty little picture.

It was the afternoon of the last day of the year and a cold, blustering December day. All the preparations for the evening were completed. Lady Fairholme and the chaperons were retiring in their respective bed-rooms, and the male portion of the visitors had been summarily sent off to the billiard-room by Miss Capel, who asserted that if they worried them all the afternoon they would have nothing left to say for the evening, so that the girls were alone, and were making the most of their solitude—a noisy, merry, chatty solitude.

"We want to be fresh for this evening," Ruby had declared merrily; "and we shall not be if we have to amuse you all the afternoon."

So the lords of creation had made a virtue of necessity, and taken themselves away to the billiard-room, where they consoled themselves with billiards and pool, while the girls assembled round the fire in the oak parlor and gossiped over their afternoon tea, and dreamed of past, present, and future conquests, while Shirley's white fingers ran swiftly over the black and the white keys, filling the room with melody.

Gayly and sweetly—Shirley's voice had lost its pathetic thrill now, but it had not lost its sweetness—the rich tones rang out—

"Goldenheart dear, Goldenheart dear
Thus pondered of lovers who yet should appear."

"Who yet shall appear!" laughed Ruby Capel. "Not like yours, Shirley!"

A pretty rose flush—which it was a pity Guy could not see—mounted slowly over the soft creamy pallor of Shirley's face as she glanced for a moment as the white fingers, on one of which—the fourth finger on the left hand—there gleamed a thick gold band with the word "Guy" studded in diamonds. Major Stuart had been royally generous in his selection of an engagement-ring.

"Not like Shirley's," echoed Alice, who leaned back in a low American chair, looking as pretty as possible in a dress of pale blue cashmere. "Her admirer is big enough to be distinctly visible even at a distance."

"Yes, it would be difficult to overlook Shirley's beau sabreur," said Ruby gayly; "I always feel as if I had gone back to my infancy when I am anywhere in his neighborhood."

"So do I," remarked Rhoda Montolieu laughing, "although I am not a pocket Venus like you, Ruby. By the by, Shirley, I don't think you had better do much flirting to-night; if one may judge by Major Stuart's gray eyes, he would not like it."

"Never judge by appearances," said Alice, carelessly. "Is it not Oliver Goldsmith who says that a reserved lover makes a jealous husband? One can not accuse Major Stuart of being a reserved lover."

"No," agreed Ruby. "Altogether they are a very well-behaved pair of engaged people—not nearly so objectionable as some couples are in the circumstances. Shirley, my dear," she added, raising her voice a little, "we have quite done—for the present, at any rate—discussing your fiance and your engagement, so will you give us the next verse of the song that we were rude enough to interrupt?"

Shirley, who had been letting her fingers wander aimlessly over the ivory keys, the color flickering in her cheeks as she listened, started slightly as Ruby's voice fell on her ear, and in a voice a little less assured, perhaps, but equally sweet, she went on singing—

Goldenheart said, "If a soldier should come,
A province for spoil he shall bring,
Or, if a rich man, he shall lay down a sum
Sufficient to ransom a king.
Or, if my lover a poet should be,
I'd ask him in song to immortalize me."
Goldenheart fair, Goldenheart fair
Dreamt many a project of fantasy there.

"I am afraid your soldier does not bring a province, Shirley dear," whispered Ruby Capel, softly—she had left her seat on the rug and come up softly behind Shirley.

Miss Ross laughed, but a quick shadow passed over her face.

"No," she replied, lightly; "Guy's province consists of four hundred a year and his pay."

"Poor Shirley, who always wanted to be rich!" said Ruby, regretfully; and again the dark swift shadow crossed Shirley's face.

"But, you see, dear, it is not to be," she returned, smiling.

"If you had waited a little, you would have had a chance of Sir Hugh," said outspoken Ruby; and an angry color sprung into Alice Fairholme's cheeks as she caught the words.

"Should I?" Shirley answered, carelessly. "Sir Hugh might not have given me the chance."

"I believe he would—I think he admires you immensely."

Shirley laughed as she turned over the last page of her song, and Ruby smiled to herself at the proud tender intonations which came into the soft rich voice as she sung

Never a soldier, or rich man, or bard
Came wooing in Goldenheart's bower,
But only a poor youth who pleaded full hard,
And brought but his love for a dower.
She, silly maiden, forgetting her test,
Saw merely the lover who loved her the best;
Goldenheart sweet, Goldenheart sweet
Thinks now that love's triumph is wholly complete.

The sweet voice ceased; Shirley left the piano and came out of the recess, and then she went to the table, and began pouring herself out some tea.

"I suppose you share Goldenheart's conviction," said Alice, rather contemptuously; Ruby's careless words had vexed her, and she could not refrain from making her vexation felt by the innocent cause of them.

"What conviction?" Shirley asked, laughingly, glancing back at her cousin from where she stood at the table.

"That 'love's triumph is wholly complete,'" Alice answered, looking a little disconcerted under Shirley's steady, inquiring look. "As Major Stuart did not bring a province for spoil, and you accepted him, we must either conclude that love's triumph is complete, or—"

"Or what, Alice?" asked Shirley, calmly.

"Or that you accepted him faute de mieux," replied Miss Fairholme; and the slight, disdainful, contemptuous laugh with which the words were spoken made Shirley's cheeks burn.

"Nonsense, Alice," said Ruby, quickly. "I dare say Shirley has had lots of offers."

"I have never heard of them, then," declared Alice, disdainfully.

"You are wrong, Ruby," said Shirley, quickly. "Your friendship is generous enough to give me credit for refusing a duke, I dare say; but Alice will tell you that it is conclusive evidence in favor of my never having received a better offer since I accepted Major Stuart's—and I will acknowledge that his was the first I received."

"But you don't mean to say that you would throw Guy over if you got a better offer?" questioned Ruby, quickly. I should not believe you if you did so, Shirley."

Shirley's faint blush faded slowly, and she hesitated a moment before answering; then, catching sight of her cousin's face, she replied, carelessly

"I am not at all sure that I could resist temptation, Ruby, if it came in my way. It is not likely to do so, however, so you need not be at all anxious, Alice."

As she spoke Shirley moved away with her charming grace of movement, and sat down in one of the low chairs near the window, her heart beating more quickly than usual in her vexation and anger against herself for the false words she had spoken. Ah, if she could have guessed with what tears of bitter anguish she would regret them in the future, when no tears could blot them out, no anguish make them unsaid!

"You see, after all, it was faute de mieux," said Alice, contemptuously; and even as she spoke the door opened, and Sir Hugh in his heavy fur-trimmed coat came quickly in.

"May I come in?" he said, smiling. "I hear that you have shut us all out, and that there is no admittance except on business. Well, I have come on business."

"Sir Hugh," Alice exclaimed, sitting up upon her cushions, flushed and rosy, "are you a deserter or an avant courier?"

"Something of both," he answered, smiling at her. "Lady Fairholme said that we might all come over to dinner; and, as Stuart was obliged to come now, I could not resist the tempation of driving him across. He has had a telegram, Miss Ross, but he will be here in a moment to tell you himself. Meanwhile, will any of you fair ladies take pity on me and give me a cup of tea?"

"So you are converted!" Alice said, with a laugh, as she went to the table. "I thought we should convert you, Sir Hugh."

"Anything poured out by you would be nectar," he answered, bending his handsome head over her as he stood by her side. "Have you missed us a little?" he added, softly.

"Not at all," Alice said, with smiling lips, but her eyes told a very different tale. "You men are so conceited that you would quite believe me if I were to say that we had been victims of ennui ever since you left us."

"You would have been if you had had no substitutes," laughed Sir Hugh, audaciously. "That half hour after dinner before the men put in an appearance must be a regular pennance, if we may judge from the faces of the ladies! What have you been doing with yourselves?

"Oh, we have read a little, worked a little, and talked—"

"A great deal, I suppose," he laughed.

"Of course, a great deal," answered Alice. "A lot of women are sure to talk a great deal."

"Don't you remember the old Persian creed," said Shirley Ross, turning her fair face towards them for a moment, "that Providence sent down ten measures of talk for the use of the whole of mankind, and that women took nine of them?"

"Shirley, for shame!" laughed Ruby Capel. "How can you try to promulgate such a libel on our sex?"

"I did not say it was my creed," Shirley said laughingly. "I said it was a doctrine held by the Persians. They held some very queer notions with regard to our sex, you know, Ruby."

"I know! Horrid old heretics! They ought to have been ashamed of themselves," Ruby answered, laughing. "I am sure Mohammed must have been jilted by somebody to have made him exclude us from Paradise."

"Perhaps she threw him over for a richer suitor," put in Sir Hugh laughing; "although one would have thought that the old prophet would have been a very good catch."

"But Shirley argues that throwing over one suitor for another more blessed with this world's goods is quite legitimate," said Alice Fairholme, eagerly; and Sir Hugh glanced across at her cousin with a swift eager glance.

"Shirley said nothing of the kind," interposed Ruby, hastily. "Alice quite misunderstood what Shirley did say."

"I do not think I did," said Alice, quietly. "Shirley is there to corroborate my statement or contradict it, as she likes. Did you not say so, Shirley."

Shirley's hazel eyes, which had been fixed dreamily on the uncurtained window, came back slowly and went to Alice's face in the same absent manner.

"What did I say, Alice?" she asked, carelessly and indifferently; and, as she spoke, Guy's voice was distinctly audible outside speaking to Sir Gilbert. The color mounted slowly in Shirley's beautiful face as she caught the sound of the rich deep tones.

"You said," Alice replied, quickly, "that there was conclusive evidence in favor of your never having received a better offer, since you had accepted Major Stuart's."

"I believe I did say something to that effect," Shirley replied, indifferently. "But surely, Alice dear, you have something more entertaining for Sir Hugh than a recital of the afternoon's chatter? It cannot possibly interest him."

"There could be nothing in the world so interesting to me," Sir Hugh said promptly. "So," he added, slowly and distinctly, "Miss Ross holds it as a part of her creed that there is no harm in throwing over one lover for another, so long as that other is rich enough to make jilting a prudent proceeding?"

"Exactly," said Alice, vindictively.

But Shirley did not heed, for Guy Stuart had entered the room, and was greeting Miss Montolieu, who was nearest him, as he came in. Then he passed on quietly to Alice's side.

"I am sorry to say that I have come to bid you good-bye, Miss Fairholme," he said. "I have had a telegram from my uncle's doctor, desiring me to go to him at once, if I wish to see him alive.

"Oh, Major Stuart, I am indeed grieved!" Alice returned, with ready courtesy. "Poor Shirley! How disappointed she will be!"

Guy glanced across the room to where Shirley stood talking to Sir Gilbert, who had followed Major Stuart into the oak parlor; she was very pale, but she was listening to and answering her uncle with perfect composure.

"I am very disappointed myself," he said, quietly. "I had no wish to pass New Year's day in a railway carriage; but, you see, it cannot be helped—and I have no time to lose, Miss Fairholme," he added, quickly, seeing that Shirley had already escaped, from the room. "I must catch the 7 p. m. train from Dumfife."

"It is not a pleasant time of the year for travelling," remarked Alice, with a graceful little shiver. "I don't envy you, Major Stuart. But I hope you will find your uncle better than you expect. Medical men are not infallible, you know."

"Thank you; I hope so," said Guy absently. "Good-bye, Miss Fairholme. You will, I hope, allow me to thank you for your kindness during my visit at the Court?"

"You must at least carry away one pleasant reminiscence with you," she responded, smiling, as she gave him her hand. "Good-bye, Major Stuart. We will take good care of Shirley during your absence. I hope you will not be snowed up on your way."

"I hope not," Guy said, as he spoke his farewells and hurried out of the room.

"Poor Shirley! Hard lines for her!" remarked Ruby, regretfully. "Her pleasure is spoiled."

"Yes, poor child," said Alice, in her soft voice, mindful as she spoke what a quick, half-angry, half-triumphant light shone in Sir Hugh's blue eyes. "But what can't be cured must be endured, you know, Ruby; so she must bear it as philosophically as she can."

The Young Barrister.

As soon as I put my shingle out I waited for many a day
To try and rope some client in who'd ask my advice and pay;
But the few who came were ever the same, for with malice and evil intent
They would take the advice and pronounce it wise, but never would pay a cent.

At length I had an "accident" case. An humble client came,
Supporting himself with the aid of a crutch; he was seedy and gaunt and lame;
He said the machinery in a mill had broken his ribs and leg,
And now he was forced to give up work, and was even compelled to beg.

I sued the corporation, and the jury were solid for me;
I recovered a handsome verdict, too—just about paid my fee;
So, in dealing with corporations, if you have a chance to sue 'm,
Be sure and apply unsparingly the maxim—"soc et tuem!"

It having been pointed out to the Town Council of Edinburgh that many of the historic monuments and tombstones in Greyfriars' Churchyard had been allowed to fall into a state of decay, the Council on Monday visited the churchyard to ascertain their exact condition. As a result of their examination they decided that unless some step is taken to preserve them the lettering will in a few years become illegible, and their sculptured beauties will be destroyed. Accordingly, it was resolved, in the first place, to advertise for persons interested in the monuments; and if there is no response, it is understood that the Council itself will take the matter in hand. It is also suggested that a tablet should be erected to mark the graves of the father and sister of Sir Walter Scott.

New Way to Mend Broken Ribs.

A young woman physician who practices in Englewood tells of a queer case in surgery which she heard of a few weeks ago, or rather a case of most unusual surgical treatment for a common injury. A young man had suffered a fall from the cars, and on examination it was found that two of his ribs had been broken. The doctor who was called to the case—a man doctor, by the way—told the patient's mother to make a big bowl of mush and milk, and to coax the wounded man to eat as much of it as he could possibly hold. This was done, and then the doctor told the wondering mother to bring him one of her old corsets, the largest one she had. The good woman blushingly obeyed, and stood by with bulging eyes and watched the doctor put the corset on his patient and draw the strings comfortably tight. "Keep the boy filled with mush and milk all night, if possible," was the doctor's injunction, as he packed up his traps to go away, "and be sure that the corset strings don't get any looser than they are now. I'll come again in the morning." The next day the ingenious medical man declared that the broken ribs would soon be knitted well together again, and that they were growing as nice and straight as you please. "The mush and milk on the inside and the corset on the outside is what did the business," he said. —Chicago Herald.

A case of transfusion is reported from the neighborhood of Alresford, Hampshire England. BRIDGING THE CHANNEL.

A Plan to Connect England and France by a Great Iron Pathway.

As a proof of the interest which Frenchmen take in the success of the channel tunnel scheme, every fresh rebuff which it encounters is the signal for the renewal of a chorus of groans and vituperation on this side of the water. The tunnel project, however, is doomed, and, meanwhile, another plan for the comfort of the traveller and the development of trade between the two countries is being studied. It is the reverse side of the medal. If trains are not to speed between England and France via the bowels of the earth, why should they not steam along in mid-air, independent of wind and wave? I need not remind you that this is scarcely a model idea, but it is returning to the front and a company is to try to carry it through if the fates be propitious. The bridge is intended to start from Ambleteuse, on the French coast, running almost due north to Folkestone, a distance of about twenty-two miles. Rising about thirty-five feet from the sea level, and supported on piers each fifty-five yards by thirty yards in breadth, planted at intervals of 600 yards from each other, it would be constructed of solid iron, would be thirty-five yards in width, and would have four railway lines, with paths for vehicles and pedestrians. Ships provided with the highest masts would be able to sail with ease under the bridge, and the risk of vessels coming into collision with the piers would be averted by electric lights, fog-horns, bells, and a host of other apparatus. Admiral Cloue, formerly Minister of Marine, is enthusiastic over the idea, and in a conversation which he has just had with a representative of a Parisian contemporary he has expressed the opinion that the scheme is thoroughly practicable. He meets the objection from the military point of view the bridge might be a source of peril to England by proposing that at each end of the gigantic viaduct a swivel bridge should be provided, which on the first symptom of alarm could be swung open on either side, thus immediately putting a stop to all communication. When all the panic was over the swivel bridge could be swung back into its old position in a trice.—London Telegraph.

How It Happened.

A teacher who had just been given a primary school was so seriously annoyed by the numerous accidents arising from the presence in the pupils' desks of bottles of clear water and bottles of soapy water, as well as indescribable sponges and rags of all degrees of humidity and unpleasantness, and the confusion and noise attendant upon the frequent washings of forty slates during school hours, that she felt herself obliged to forbid in most positive terms the washing of any slate by any scholar except at recess time. Happening to glance down the middle aisle the following morning, she spied a child evidently washing her slate quietly but most thoroughly. Quick as a flash the teacher was at her side, and, holding up the slate to the view of the school, said:

"Annie, did I not forbid you all to wash your slates in school hours?"

"Yes, ma'am; but I did not wash my slate. My sponge is in my desk."

"Not wash your slate, Annie? Why, it is dripping wet. Did any one else wash it?"

"No, ma'am; I didn't either."

"If you did not wash it, Annie, what did you do with it?"

"I only rubbed it off with my dry rag."

"How comes it to be so wet, then, if you only rubbed it off with your dry rag?"

"My dry rag was wet," was the naive reply.—Harper's Bazar.

Selling a Husband.

An extraordinary case of bargaining between two women, by which one relinquished in favor of the other, upon a monetary consideration, all claim upon her lawful husband, has taken place at Sheffield. The husband in question, being out of work, a few months ago went out to Australia, and on his way out made the acquaintance of a young woman, who appeared to have formed a strong attachment for him. Finding that he was already in the bonds of matrimony, she suggested, it is said, that possibly the "wife left at home would sell him to her," and he, jokingly, advised her to "write and ask." However, she did write, and the wife, possibly thinking that the value of a husband 10,000 miles away was not incalculable, and being of a frugal mind, not only wrote that she was willing to sell, but named her price, £100. This figure was too high for the fair colonist—for her purse at least, if not for her affections, and she replied by a bid of £20, which was at length accepted. The money was sent, and with it a document drawn up in legal form, setting forth that for the sum named the wife relinquished all future claim to her husband. This was signed by the wife and sent back to Australia. The latest report is that the man and the woman have since been married.—Liverpool Post.

THE ONLY FEMALE MAYOR.

How She Was Elected and Why She Fail to Please Some People.

"Female mayors are no good," said the ex-City Marshal of Argonia, Kan. "Why, Mrs. Salter has just killed Argonia. I used to have a hotel there and was the City Marshal, but I couldn't stand it, so I just scooted, and I expect I'm to blame for her election, too.

"You know she wasn't nominated in any of the conventions. About 9 o'clock on 'lection day all us boys were feeling gay and agreed to meet at a hall and nominate a candidate to knock out Wilson. Jack Ducker—he is the toughest man in the place and the undertaker—got up in the meetin' and nominated Mrs. Susanna Medora Salter for Mayor, and the nomination was made unanimous. We rushed into the streets and commenced to work for our candidate. At noon her husband came to us and begged us to quit the racket, sayin' it was an insult to his wife. We wouldn't do it, and the voters commenced to come our way in clusters. We got full of whiskey and enthusiasm, and at 4 o'clock every one was votin' for our candidate. Well, you know as how she was elected. We had a jollification, and when she took her seat like a man all our fun was busted.

"I sent up to Kansas City for some crab apple cider just to please the boys. She heard of it and asked me to stop it. You can't fight a woman and she the Mayor. Then I started a little poker room, more for sociability than anything else. Chips were only ten cents. She heard of it and came to me and I had to stop. Then the druggist, before she was elected, used to keep blue grass bitters, lemon rye and extract of malt, and a few other things like that. He don't do it now. The Mayor heard of it. Then the two billiard rooms were running. They're closed up now. The Mayor don't think it is fashionable to push the ivories. That's the way it is with everything. I just couldn't stand the town and so I came up here."

"She's the only woman Mayor on earth, is she not?

"That's just what she is. You ought to see the letters she gets, foreign letters and the like, askin' for her autograph, and askin' her if it is true that she is the Mayor, and all questions like that. When I was marshal I used to act under her, and many's the letter she has shown me from abroad."—Indianapolis Journal.

Unrewarded Genius.

"Papa," said the little boy, "how long did it take you to write this book?"

"Nearly a year, my boy."

"Did you work very hard at it?"

"Every page has my heart's blood in it."

"Ain't that queer? I don't see any."

"No, you don't see it. Nobody else seemed to, either."

"Did you make any money out of it, papa?"

"Oh, yes (drearily). I made $250."

"Is that all? Why the paper says that John L. Sullivan made ten times that much in one night by knocking another man down a few times. Why didn't you learn to be a fighter? Or why didn't you keep a saloon? The saloon-keeper's boy dresses better'n I do."

The learned author of the work, "The World's Onward March, as Proved by Retrospective Glances and Assured by Infallible Signs," made no reply. He merely emptied another coal scuttle full of the precious volumes into the stove for fuel, went out into the raging storm and walked up and down the lonely streets for an hour, talking earnestly and volubly to himself in Sanskrit.—Chicago Tribune.

Thomas A' Becket's Skull.

In Canterbury Cathedral 710 years ago Thomas A' Becket was assassinated. He, like Wolsey and others in later days, had experienced the fickleness of princes' favors. He was a wonderfully gifted man, and there is no more interesting chapter of English history than that which describes his life to triumph and defeat, of victory and death. He was canonized as St. Thomas of Canterbury, and his shrine was a famous resort before Chaucer described it in "Canterbury Tales." It has been said that his remains and shrine were burned by Henry VIII., but recent reports are as follows:

"Thomas A' Becket's bones have at last been found in a rough-hewn stone coffin under Canterbury Cathedral, where heretofore their existence was only legendary. The skull is well perserved, and is said to be magnificent in size and proportions; in fact, one of the finest ever seen. Its crown bears unmistakable marks of a sword cut, which the chroniclers relate took off the top of his scalp."

He Couldn't Understand Women.

There was a little incident on a cable-line car yesterday morning that made all on board laugh. There was such a touch of humor in it and so much of human nature that the mirth was as free and spontaneous as the rippling murmur of a brook. The car had just stopped at the Priests of Pallas Hall and a large, genial faced jovial kind of a man assisted a lady to alight. As the car started again he rather earnestly remarked:

"Now, there goes my wife to hear Sam Jones tell her of her faults." Then, after an impressive pause: "Yet when I try to tell her of them at home there is a terrible racket. I can't understand women."—Kansas City Times.

OLD MAN CAMPBELL.

The Father-in-Law that "Baby Bunting" Narrowly Escaped.

Many a good story is told of John Campbell, the pioneer iron manufacturer of the Hanging Rock iron region, of Ohio, whose daughter, Miss Clara, sued Charles Arbuckle for breach of promise. The old gentleman is a plain man, who does not understand the ways of society, and perfers ordinary jeans trousers to the finest broadcloth. When his daughter, Mrs. William Means, was married, the wedding was a social event of great moment in southern Ohio. It was a fashionable affair, and 9 o'clock in the evening was the time set for the ceremony. The head of the house watched the preparations with misgivings, and was told for some sufficient reason that his daughter was to be married earlier in the day. Accordingly, he was all ready for the event by 2 o'clock, and waited impatiently for the wedding party to appear. When 8 o'clock, which was his usual bedtime, arrived, his patience was exhausted, and he decided to retire, notwithstanding the fact that his house was full of guests. Going to his apartment, which had been given up to the ladies for a toilet room, he pushed aside bonnets, hats, and wraps, and crawled into bed, and was soon sound asleep, regardless of what was going on down stairs. When the time came to give away the bride, her father couldn't be found, and that part of the ceremony was necessarily omitted. It was not until the guests were departing that he was discovered lying amid the bonnets and wraps, many of which he had ruined.

Origin of Leap Year.

A correspondent writing to the New York World of the custom observed every fourth year of permitting the fairer sex to assume the rights and prerogatives appertaining to their brothers during the remaining three, says "that a law enacted by the Parliament of Scotland in 1288 is doubtless the first statutory recognition of its existence." The law is thus quoted: "It is statut and ordaint that during the reine of Her Maist Blessit Magestie, ilk fourth year, known as leap year, ilk maiden ladye of baith high and low estait shall hae liberty to bespeak ye man she likes; albeit, gif he refuses to tak hir to be his wyfe, he shall be mulcted in ye summe of ane dundis or less, and his estait moit be, except and awisgif he can mak it appear that he is betrothit to ane ither woman, that he then shall be free."

A Labor Commissioner Robbed.

Mr. John Armstrong, a member of the Labor Commission, got up in Montreal yesterday a poorer man by $400 than when he went to bed at his hotel Wednesday evening. Although he does not say much about his loss, it is learned that the unfortunate commissioner supposed he had bolted his door on retiring, but his pocketbook had left during the night. The police are on the track of the robber.

A Natural Question.

CANON DUMOULIN SHOCKED.

Toronto's Immorality and Crime Strongly Denounced.

In his sermon in St. James' Cathedral, Toronto, yesterday morning Canon Dumoulin, speaking of the approach of Lent and the time for repentance, said in effect: Read the records in the daily papers—how they startle one, even in our own fair city. The court lists contains every species of crime, even the most degraded—crimes that brought their curse on Sodom and Gomorrah—and yet our city is far-famed for its purity. By the Labor Commission, now in session in a neighboring city, facts were revealed that should shame the perpetrators into oblivion, and the law should pronounce no mild penalty. This state of things, and in a Christian progressing country, would degrade a heathen civilization.

Breaking the News.

They are telling a story on a well known and now wealthy Irishman of this city, which, it is said, happened before he was either so wealthy or so well known, says the Kansas City Times. Judge McCarty, so the story goes, had been killed by an accident, and the problem was how to break the news to his wife. The Irishman in question volunteered to break the news so gently that it would not jar on the most sensitive feelings. Putting the body in a waggon, he started for Mrs. McCarty's residence.

"Does the Widow McCarty live here?" he asked significantly.

"She does not," said Mrs. McCarty.

"But indade she does. The Widow McCarty does live here!" he insisted with more significance and greater emphasis on the "widow."

"But she does not," replied Mrs. McCarty.

Disgusted at her lack of perspicuity, the bearer of the bad news asked in despair:

"An' faith, does Judge McCarty live here?"

"He does."

"Well, I'll bet yes tin dollars he does not."

"But he does," insisted Mrs. McCarty.

"But he does not," insisted Pat. "I'll bet yes tin dollars he does not," and then in utter despair he added, "for I've got his corpse in me wagin, an' a foiner wone was nivir seen at a wake.

The idea of any universal language is a fantastic freak that could only find lodgment in the brain of a crank.—London Advertiser.

Nonsense! What is written music but a universal language?—the language of the emotions, but still a language. —Hamilton Spectator.

All right in a sense, but let us have a test of it. Take a full orchestra and have it play the overture to the "Flying Dutchman" before the Ahkound of Swat, and let him reply by a gang of semi-naked natives beating on gongs, and let us know how far you mutually understand each other.—London Advertiser.

To-Day's Church News.

Dr. Patton, who has just been elected to succeed Dr. McCosh as President of Princeton, was born in Bermuda in 1843 and took a classical course in the University of Toronto and a theological course at Knox College.

Rev. Dr. Ryckman has been invited by the quarterly board of Wellington Street Methodist Church, London, to remain as pastor for another year.

A Precocious Plea.

Bertha (who has come in too late for the anecdote)—What are you laughing at mamma? Tell me what Mrs. Frivole said, please!

Mrs. Brown Stone—Impossible, my child. It was not a story for children of your age.

Bertha—Oh, do tell me, mamma! I promise I won't understand a word.

What is an Anarchist?

One of our esteemed contemporaries confesses to some difficulty in describing an anarchist—thus betraying a lack of intelligence which is really deplorable. An anarchist is a person who thinks it is folly for a man to work or wash, and who proves his faith by his example.—Philadelphia Press.

Work and Wages.

An unskilled Japanese farm hand, according to a correspondent who writes from Hiogo, receives only from 5c. to 10c. a day for his labor, and out of this small sum he is expected to board himself. Skilled farm labor commands from 10c. to 15c. a day.

Pop not, pop not, ye hapless sons of clay,
Girls' gayest wreathes are made of high priced flowers
Things that are made to fade and fall away,
Ere they have blossomed for a few short hours.

Pop not, pop not! The girl you pop will wed,
The rosy lip will gladly smile on you;
The softly melting eye grow strangely red—
Beware, young man, whatever else you do!

Pop not, pop not! Oh, warning, vainly said
In leap year hours as in the years gone by;
Cash flings a halo round the dear one's head,
And "git thar" is the universal cry.

—Washington Critic.

At the annual meeting of the British Chamber of Shipping on Saturday some interesting statistics were given by the President in his address. The statistics of last year for the United Kingdom showed that 35 iron steamers were built or in process of construction against 57 in 1886, and 256 of steel against 137; as to sailing vessels there were 12 of iron against 39 and 18 of steel against 11. From these figures he concluded that steel as a material in the construction of vessels was rapidly superseding iron; that sailing vessels, even of the larger type, were found unable to compete with the newest type of steamers, and that composite and wooden sailing vessels for mercantile purposes had ceased to be built. Those results have been brought about within the last few years, and were evidence of the earnestness of the British shipowner, ever ready to avail himself of the most approved modes of construction, even although he thereby depreciated his existing property; for it was true of shipping as of other industries, that to stand still was to go back.

Tit-Bits.

Mr. W. J. Gilchrist, one of Artemesia's sons, is now living in Grand Forks County, Dakota, U. S. He enclosed a dollar for THE ADVANCE the other day, as he wants to get all the news from this section of the county of Grey.

Messrs. Irish and Smith, the gifted "Emerald Duet," were in town last Friday. Their labors in Owen Sound were attended with great success, over one hundred members being added to the Royal Templars' Council in that town. They left for Hamilton by the afternoon train where they will spend a few days in much needed rest with their respective families.

It is said by Professor Johnston—the Hamilton "spread Eagle" and "John Bull Lion" colored gentlemen—that "de sun do move and de earth don't move no more on her' axletrees dan anything;" and "dat' de earth am as flat as a sliced water mellyum." But there can be no possible chance for dispute, in regard to the abilities of Booth, the Boss Barber, of Flesherton, to shave or cut your hair slicker than anybody else within twenty miles square. Professor Johnson would get new ideas if he gave Booth the job of removing the surplus wool off his head. It would give his brains a chance to cool off!

Born.

Ornelia.—On Sunday Feb. 12th, the wife of John Ornelia Flesherton of a daughter.

Died.

MATHEWSON.—On 15th. inst., Mrs. Eliza. Mathewson, of Artemesia, aged 86. Deceased was a native of Ireland. Came to Canada about 50 years ago and settled in Toronto. Then she came to this section of country 24 years ago, here she lived until the hour of her death.

WHERE IT ENDS nine-tenths of the disease denominated Catarrh is the result of protracted or oft-repeated colds in the head. Nasal Balm will give immediate relief and permanently cures.

A Large Monument.

Mr. Vanzant, of Flesherton, is putting up in our Union Cemetery here a monument for the late James Kerr, Esq., of Euphrasia. It is the most magnificent in this section of Ontario. The marble came from New Brunswick. The freight on it from New Brunswick to Toronto was $55, and from Toronto to Thornbury it was $51. This will give our readers some idea of how they charge on the Northern.

The monument weighs fifteen tons and comes in four pieces. It will be set in solid masonry, and when erected will stand about twenty-five feet high. The cost of the monument will be about $1,500. Mr. Vanzant will inscribe it here. Owen Sound Standard

Sunday School Social at Eugenia.

Correspondence of The Advance.

The Eugenia Sunday School Social, as previously announced, was held in the Orange Hall on Wednesday evening of last week and was a decided success beyond the most sanguine anticipation. Socially, intellectually and financially, a success. The proceeds amounting to over $10, to be applied in purchasing requisites for the School. After the tea had been served, which was a rich and abundant treat, all that the most fastidious epicure could wish, provided by the lady friends of the School who always reflect credit to themselves by the very choice and enticing viands they spread for the children (God bless them) and all the assembled Friends.

Mr. H. Meldrum, the present superintendent of the School occupied the chair, and after making a few suitable remarks proceeded to have carried out a lengthy and much appreciated programme, consisting of addresses, readings, recitations, dialogues, vocal and instrumental music that had been prepared for the occasion. To give the programme item by item would trespass on too much of your valuable space, Mr. Editor. Suffice it to say the participants in the readings, recitations &c., all acquitted themselves in a happy and appropriate manner. The taking feature was the beautiful music by the adult Choir, which in itself was a treat to the audience. Towards the close Mr. F. T. Carr convened the audience into a large singing class and exercised their vocal talent in that choice Gospel Hymn, "There we'll have a Happy Time," which raised the spirits of the already delighted people into the greatest good humor. The usual votes of thanks were tendered, Doxology sung and Benediction pronounced. This brought to a close one of the most enjoyable entertainments Eugenia has ever seen.

From our own Correspondent.

The annual Sabbath School anniversary and tea-meeting came off last week and was quite a success, the proceeds amounting to something over $25.

The Missionary meeting in connection with the Wesley church appointment was held last Sabbath and the church was crowded.

Mr. R. T. Brodie, of Brampton, is visiting at his brother's.

Mr. Wm. Gilbert, and family, have left here and gone to Wiarton to live.

Mr. A. Johnston has had an increase in his family.

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

Soothes and Heals

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

Mr. Thos. Bates, of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., U. S., paid Flesherton a flying visit on Thursday last. He looks as though silver mines and business generally up there were good for the health. Would'nt object to a chunk of a silver mine ourself?

A communication from Mr. James Buckingham, a paper read at Centre Grey Farmer's Institute by Dr. Christoe, a letter from "A. B. P." anent "Cheerful Women," and other matter unavoidably crowded out of this week's ADVANCE, but will appear in our next.

Dr. Sinclair, the celebrated Toronto specialist for the treatment of all Chronic Diseases, Private Diseases, diseases of the Brain and Nerves, Diseases of the Heart and Lungs, will be at Munshaws's Hotel, Flesherton, on Thursday next, March 8th, for the practice of his profession.

An Orange Soiree will be held in the lodge room of L. O. L. No. 1132, 4th line, Artemesia, on Friday, March 9th. Tea served from 5 to 7 o'clock p. m. The intellectual program will consist of addresses by several eloquent clergymen, dialogues, recitations, &c. Admission 25 cents, children half price. Proceeds to be applied to seating the hall for public as well as for private use.

Flesherton Orange Lodge has secured the services of the celebrated "Beethoven Quartette," composed of Miss Hattie Morell, soprano, Miss Ethel Woods, contralto, Mr. Sims Richards, tenor, and Mr. Chas. Kelly, basso, for a concert which will be given in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on Thursday evening next, 8th inst. Besides the above magnificent array of talent, Mr. Jim Fax, the "Funniest Man in Canada," will make his first bow to a Flesherton audience. See bills for particulars.

Hidden Things.

There are no wounds so deep as those we hide,
No sin, no cursed act that we have concealed,
And man must seek to find the costliest pearls—
They lie in ocean depths all unrevealed.

There is no hatred half so deep and dark
As that we nurse in silence in our breast.
There is no love so tender, true and strong
As that to curious scoffers unconfessed.

All hidden sin is deadliest, darkest, worst;
All hidden suffering is sharpest pain;
All hidden sweets are sweetest of the sweet—
All hidden love hath the most sacred reign.

—Edith B. VanDusen.

Owen Sound, Feb. 21st, 1888.

Cruelty to Dogs.

A number of boys in Flesherton are accused to THE ADVANCE of cruelty to dogs. It is said that the boys hitch small canines to heavily loaded hand-sleds and compel the poor brutes to drag them up hill and down hill-sometimes whipping them most unmercifully. None but a boy with worse than brutal instincts would thus maltreat a poor dumb animal, and if there are any such young rascals around here people should see that they are sharply looked after and punished.

A Kimberely Thief.

One night last week a bag of oats and a bag of grass seed was stolen from the barn of Mr. A. A. C. McConnell, of Kimberley. The thief did not cover his tracks and therefore was traced. He is a neighbor of Mr. McConnell's, and if it had not been for the good-naturedness of the magistrate there, he would have had to pay the penalty of the law. It is almost a pity, however, that the law was not allowed to take its course.

Shooting Accident.

Mr. Wm. Heard, second son of Mr. J. H. Heard of Flesherton—and another youngman were out on a rabbit-shooting expedition last Friday afternoon. They separated after getting to the bush, keeping within hailing distance, of each other. Suddenly a rabbit scurried along directly between the young men, both of whom fired their guns at the little animal almost at the same instant. Unfortunately, a couple of grains of shot hit young Mr. Heard—one cutting his lip and the other penetrating one of his eyes. His father at once sent him to the Toronto Hospital for treatment. Whether he will lose the sight of the injured optic is not yet known.

The Late Mr. Crackanthorpe.

"The late William Crackanthorpe, of Westmoreland, England, was an old chum of Lord Brougham, Coleridge, Southney, Wordsworth, Herschell, Lyell, Davy, Murchison, Sydney Smith and Mrs. Somerville. Wordsworth was his cousin. In company with Lord Bute he crossed in 1815 from Livorno to Elba and had an inteview with Napoleon Bonaparte the day before he made his escape back to France."

The above item appeared under the heading of our "Current Topics" column last week. Since then we were shown a letter—in the late Mr. Crackanthorpe's own hand-writing and written when the deceased gentleman had attained his ninety-third year!—addressed to M. Richardson, Esq., of this town. The letter was one of many received by Mr. Richardson since he came to this country. Mr. Crackanthorpe was the steady and warm friend of the former in boyhood and early manhood: and when Mr. R. came to Canada, he still manifested a deep interest in the welfare of his young friend. This feeling or interest was warmly reciprocated, and perhaps none mourns more sincerely the death of that great friend of the people, than does Mr. Richardson.

Alsike, Red Clover, and Timothy at the Medical Hall, Flesherton,—fresh and good.

Almost miraculous are some of the cures accomplished by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In the case of R. L. King, Richmond, Va., who suffered for 47 years with an aggravated form of scrofula, Ayer's Sarsaparilla effected astonishing results.

Social at Proton Station.

We had a pleasant sleighride to Proton Station and back on Friday evening last, on occasion of the annual social in connection with the neat new Presbyterian church at that place. Mr. J. W. Henderson, the genial Inspector of the North of Scotland M. Co., Toronto, furnished the equipage, obtained from Mr. W. H. Elder's popular livery stables here, and driven by that careful and experienced teamster, Mr. Wm. Mitchell. The party was composed of Mrs. Bulmer, Miss Katie Bellamy, Miss Alice Bellamy, Mr. J. W. Henderson, ye Editor, and Messrs. John, C. W. and W. J. Bellamy.

The church was well crowded with people from Dundalk, Inistioge, Flesherton, and the immediate neighborhood. The viands were excellent. After tea, the Rev. Mr. McCaul pastor of the church took the chair and conducted the proceedings with becoming dignity. The following program was presented:

1.—Instrumental selection by Miss Lamon, of Dundalk. Chaste and well rendered.

2.—Address by Mr. Morgan. Vigorous, earnest and practical.

3.—"Twilight on the sea," by the Dundalk Choral Society, composed of Mr. Spurr, of the Herald, Miss Phillips, Miss Campbell and a gentleman whose name we have forgotten; accompanied on the organ by Miss Lamon. With a little more practice this newly formed society will give a good account of itself. Mr. Spurr possesses a well trained tenor voice.

4.—Address by Mr. J. W. Henderson. Eminently practical. Sound common sense. But who ever heard J. W. deliver an address that was not practical and straight to the mark? A very happy effort throughout, and no special preparation either.

5.—Miss Lamon, solo, "Tit for Tat." Charmingly rendered.

6.—Mr. Hames, an address, and a stirring, eloquent one it was. Keen, double-cutting temperance pointers.

7.—Parks Bros. and sister. Instrumental; organ, piccolo and violin. Splendid. Vociferously encored.

8.—Duet, Miss Campbell and Miss Phillips, "Hope Beyond." Fairly well rendered.

9.—Rev. A. Wilson, an address which put every one in good humor. Individual effort the principal theme. Brief and pointed, sandwiched with a fund of dry humor.

10.—Dundalk Choral Society.

11.—A. R. Fawcett, of THE ADVANCE, an address. Surprised and somewhat confused at being so unexpectedly called upon. Got up on platform to say something. Said something and sat down.

12.—Mr. Spurr, solo. A chaste selection and excellently sung.

13.—Mr. Clemis, of Eugenia, an address. Surprised at being called upon, but made a happy little speech.

14.—Magnificent instrumental by the renowned Parks Bros. Loudly encored and gracefully responded to.

15.—Address by Mr. Spurr. Also surprised, but made a really clever, though brief, address.

16.—Solo by Mr. Spurr. Patriotic. Charmingly rendered. Fact of the matter is, Brother Spurr is undoubtedly a cultured and rising vocalist. He accompanied himself on the organ.

17.—A sensible, logicial, practical, brief, pointed, and spicy speech by Rev. Mr. Ross, of Dundalk. Pulpit and Press a leading topic.

18.—Solo by Miss Phillips. Good.

19.—Address by Mr. Graham, the well known and popular merchant, of Dundalk. Mr. G. was also surprised, but he got on the platform all the same and said some very sensible things.

20.—Parks Bros., instrumental. Good.

21.—Dundalk Choral Society.

22.—Announcement of proceeds of social, viz., $43.15, leaving a small debt of some thirty odd dollars on the church, which latter was raised by special subscription in about ten minutes and the edifice declared free of debt.

23.—Singing of the National Anthem with great enthusiasm.

24.—Benediction.

Congratulations.

For many years, Eugenia has been the only town in our fair Township of Artemesia. But now there is another and the orphan can rejoice and the solitary places be glad therefor. To our sister town (village no longer!) of Markdale we extend our profoundest and most reverential congratulations upon its recent elevation to the dignity of a town—or Township? And now a momentous question thrusts itself upon the newly elevated town (ship), viz., who'll be Lord Mayor? But more anon.

Racing on the Street.

Will people, who make it a practice to race their horses on our streets, kindly knock the idea into their respective noddles, that it is illegal to do so? If they don't perhaps our magistrates can be induced to extend them an invitation, by means of the constable, to attend at the Division Court Clerk's office where some useful and much needed information would be imparted.

Messrs. M. Richardson & Co.

In this age of shoddy peddlers, tramp storekeepers, and what not, it is gratifying to find so many people patronizing their local business men first, last and all the time. We have always had great pleasure in recommending the firm of M. Richardson & Co. to the public, and never more so than now. They are square business men and everything they sell will be found as represented. Their mammoth store here is being daily stocked with piles of choice spring goods. The millinery department is unequalled in Centre or East Grey, while in hardware they enjoy a very extensive patronage.

Death.

We regret to learn of the death of the eldest child of our townsman, Mr. J. W. Bates—a bright little girl about five years of age—on Friday last. Mr. and Mrs. Bates have the sympathy of all in their bereavement.

A purgative medicine should possess tonic and curative, as well as cathartic properties. This combination of ingredients may be found in Ayer's Pills. They strengthen and stimulate the bowels, causing natural action.

Fifteen bills to amend the "Municipal Act" have been submitted to the Ontario Legislature thus far this session. How many more?

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER X.

Shirley was standing waiting for Guy in the great hall; and, as he went toward her, with a very forlorn look in her lustrous hazel eyes she put out two trembling little hands to meet his. The hall was all ready for the ball, being profusely decorated with evergreens and garlands, and rich crimson hangings, while the polished floor was simply perfect for dancing. It was a pretty and useful ball-room, being somewhat out of the common, for in the recesses the suits of steel armor caught and reflected back the light and lamplight, and the grand staircase at one end, carpeted in crimson, would make a very comfortable resting place for the tired dancers by and by. Shirley was standing before the great wood-fire that was blazing on the wide old fashioned hearth, a slender drooping figure in a black dress; and as she put out her hands to meet Guy's the diamonds on the little white left hand flashed and gleamed in the firelight.

"Oh, Guy," she cried pitifully, as he took the little hands in his strong clasp, "this is a dreadful disappointment!"

"Is it, dear?" he said kindly. "I am very sorry, Shirley."

"But you go?" she whispered unsteadily. "Oh, Guy, it is my first ball, and I wanted to be so happy to-night!"

"And I hope you will be happy," he replied, smiling a little—"you must be happy without me, my child."

"Happy without you!" Shirley echoed dreadfully. "I can't, Guy. Do you think"—she lifted her eyes to his with a little coquetry—"that you could be happy without me?"

Guy's smile deepened.

"I think I could, my child, if it were necessary," he answered; "and I expect you will be so to-night."

"Then I am sorry to say that your expectations will be disappointed" she said bravely. "Guy, don't you care? Are you not a little sorry?" she added earnestly, lifting great sorrowful eyes to his face.

"My dear little girl, I am very sorry," he answered fondly, putting his arm around her and drawing her to his side. "I never cared much for balls, but I confess that I have been looking forward to this one. I wanted to see Miss Ross in all the grandeur of her first ball dress. But other fellows will be lucky enough to do so while I am travelling in a cold, dark railway carriage. However, I shall have one consolation," he added laughingly.

"What is that, Guy?"

"I shall see you, I hope, hundreds of times in your war-paint, my darling," he replied fondly. "Don't throw me off for a richer suitor in my absence, little woman."

"As if I could!" she said sadly, too much depressed at the thought of his departure to remember her careless words.

"Could you not?" he questioned, smiling again. "Then what were those very heretical and unorthodox opinions you were giving vent to in my absence?"

"Ah!" Shirley drew a long breath and colored a little—"I did not think you heard, Guy!"

"But I did hear, Shirley," he answered, gently and, with a pretty little penitent gesture, Shirley put both hands on his breast.

"I am very sorry, Guy. I would not have said you hear them for the world; but"

"But," he said softly, "you spoke the words, did you not?"

"Yes, but not as they were repeated," she answered eagerly. "You know, Guy you are sure, are you not?—that I would not pain you for the world, and that if you were a private in your own regiment, I should love you just as dearly."

"Would you?" he answered, smiling. "Those are pleasant words to hear, sweet."

"Then let them make you forget the others," she said softly. "Those are true, the others are not. Guy, they do not pain you now, dear, do they?"

"I do not think they pained me much," he replied, smiling into the loving eyes which were lifted to his face. "We will not think any more about them, Shirley. You will write to me, dear?"

"Of course. It will be so pleasant to write to you. I have never written to any one but Jack," she said, smiling; "so you must not mind the letters being stupid."

"I dare say I shall not think them so," he answered, "especially if they tell me about yourself and your doings and your flirtations."

"My flirtations?" Shirley echoed, with wide, innocent smiling eyes. "What are they?"

"You know very well. You are a very demure little maiden on the surface; but still waters run deep. Do you think you will have forgotten me if I am away longer than a fortnight?"

"Of course, I shall in all probability have married some one else if you prolong your absence for three weeks," she answered, laughing.

Guy laughed also. It was strange how little both seemed to feel this separation. Certainly it was to be but a short one; but so much may happen in a fortnight, in a week, in a day, that some of the coming trouble must have cast its shadow upon them.

"Saucy girl!" he said. "Marry some else at your peril and his! If you do, as sure as my name is Guy Stuart, I will kill him! Therefore, if any one proposes to you in my absence, you can tell him so, and warn him."

"I certainly will," she replied merrily, and then the smile faded, and she rested her head against him wearily. "Guy, I wish you had not to go."

"So do I, love. But the dear old man has been so good to me always that I could not bear to think of him as ill and lonely. Dr. Crowter is a bit of an alarmist," he added musingly, "and he always thinks Uncle Jasper worse than he is, so that I do not believe he is so ill as he says. Why, I had, as you know, a letter from the dear old fellow last week."

"Yes—and such a kind letter. You will give him my love, Guy, and tell him that I shall always love him for his goodness to his unworthy nephew."

"You are a darling!" Guy said softly, as he bent over her and put his lips to her brow. "I really think you are fond of me, Shirley."

"I really think I am—a little," she responded laughing, but the next moment with a sudden tenderness and pain she had pressed her face against his breast. "Oh, Guy, oh, Guy, what shall I do even for those few days without you?"

"Shirley, if you cry, you will have red eyes for to-night," he said, bending over her with smiling yet sorrowful eyes; "and I cannot have people saying that Major Stuart has a queer taste to take that ugly girl! Darling, look up and give me a smile to take away with me."

"I am very sorry, Guy, old fellow," broke in Sir Hugh's voice at his friend's elbow, "but it is time to go. I cannot give you even five minutes more."

"All right—I am ready," Guy answered, as Shirley started up, flushed and trembling. "We don't mind Hugh, my darling," he went on, smiling. "He is very sympathetic, and can readily understand that I am not quite as rejoiced as I ought to be to leave you."

"Readily," Sir Hugh answered, in rather a low tone, his face looking strange and pale in the firelight.

"And I am leaving you in Hugh's charge," Guy went on fondly—both arms were round Shirley now, and his face was bent over her. "I know Sir Gilbert and Lady Fairholme are very good, but I know that Sir Hugh is my friend, and that he will take better care of my property than any one else," he added cordially; "so, sweetheart, if anything goes wrong during my absence, will you go to Hugh as frankly as you would come to me?"

"Of course, if you wish it," she said, shyly. "But, Guy, nothing can go wrong, dear."

"I think you know that nothing could give me truer pleasure than to render you any service," Sir Hugh put in, his voice a little husky, his lips parched and dry, "although of course I hope there will be no occasion."

"At any rate I leave her much less regretfully, knowing that you are at hand, old friend," Guy said, in his warm, frank manner. "Now good-bye, my darling; take care of yourself—and take care of her, Hugh."

He held her close for a moment, and Shirley clung to him with sudden passion and pain. Now for the first time a heavy foreboding of dread and terror was upon her, and she shrunk from the separation with fear and trembling.

"Darling, let me go," Guy whispered, as he unclasped the clinging hands. "Why, you foolish child, it is only for a week or two! Don't sob so, you silly girl! Why, Shirley, I shall not be able to leave you!"

Sir Hugh had walked over to the hall door and had drawn aside the heavy sheltering curtains and opened the strong iron-studded door.

"Guy, old fellow!" he cried, warningly, and at the sound of his voice Shirley started, checked her tears, and disengaged herself from Guy's clasp.

"Good-bye," she said faintly, forcing a little smile to the trembling lips. "Guy, don't forget me."

"That's my brave Shirley! No, don't come to the door, darling; it is so rough and boisterous. Oh, you wilful lassie!" he added, smiling, as she went with him, and watched him get into the dog-cart which was to take him to the station.

It was a rough, boisterous night, as he had said, but the avenue was well lighted in anticipation of the coming festivities.

Shirley stood still in the lighted doorway, with Sir Hugh at her side, as the dog-cart drove away; and Guy, turning as he came to the bend in the drive, waved his hand in farewell; then they both turned away and went into the hall again, Shirley shivering a little from the cold sharp wind which had been admitted.

"You are cold," Sir Hugh said gently; he was still very pale, and his voice was husky.

"It is a rough drive for Guy," she remarked sorrowfully, as they stood for a few seconds in front of the fire, side by side; and a momentary flash of angry pain sprung into the young man's handsome eyes.

"Yes—but I would rather be Guy driving away in the cold wind and darkness than—than—the happiest man in the world," Sir Hugh said slowly. "Ah, forgive me, Miss Ross. I will not offend you again. That was an irrepressible little outburst," he added, with a smile. "I won't vex you by my folly any more. And now, since Guy has left you in my charge," he continued, "will you not let me ask you to go and lie down for an hour or two, so as to be rested for to-night? Guy would not like to think that he had spoiled all your pleasure."

"But Aunt Geraldine will not be pleased if I do not come down to dinner," she said, coloring shyly, and smiling a little as she added, "and I don't think Guy would be pleased if I were to let people think I was such a goose as to cry because he has left me for a fortnight; so, I must not, although I should like it, act upon your suggestion, Sir Hugh."

"It is because it is my suggestion that it finds no favor in your eyes," he said regretfully. "Do you bear malice, Miss Ross? No? Then give me your hand in token of forgiveness, and, as I am Guy's friend, let me be yours."

With a little smile she gave him her hand, and Sir Hugh bent over it and touched it with his lips. As he did so, Alice Fairholme and Ruby Capel, coming out of the oak-parlor, saw the two standing by the hall fire; and Ruby said in surprise

"Why, it is Shirley and Sir Hugh!"

"Shirley putting her theory into practice," remarked Alice, with irrepressible bitterness. "She ought to be ashamed of herself!" she added as she passed up the broad staircase, holding her graceful head erect, and sweeping her soft blue dress disdainfully after her.

And Ruby, as she followed, with a touch of gravity on her beautiful piquant face, was reminded of the lines of the old song—

> It is well to be off with the old love
> Before you are on with the new, and resolved to take Shirley to task for flirting before poor Guy's back was fairly turned.

CHAPTER XI.

"It seems as if the Fates would be propitious, Latreille," said Sir Hugh Glynn to his servant, as he put the finishing touches to his evening dress a little later in the evening. "Nothing could have been more a propos than Major Stuart's departure."

"The game is in your own hand, Sir Hugh," returned Latrielle quietly. "A proverb in my country says that 'the absent are always in the wrong.' I think you will be able to see that Major Stuart was in the wrong to leave Miss Ross so confidingly. He must know that such a beautiful young lady will not lack admirers."

"It is a nasty business," Sir Hugh said rather disconsolately. "I wish Guy were not so trusting," he said to himself, "he makes it so difficult to deceive him. Poor old Guy! We were boys together too."

"It will not be your fault if Miss Ross changes her mind, Sir Hugh," remarked his valet coolly. "You are not to blame if she has the good taste to prefer you to Major Stuart."

"But she will not," Sir Hugh said coolly.

"Then the alternative is in your own hands, Sir Hugh. I have shown you that it is an easy matter, and the young lady, even if she storms a little, will be grateful to you when she finds that she is really Lady Glynn."

"And it is safe and secure?"

"As safe and secure, Sir Hugh, as if the Archbishop of Canterbury had performed the ceremony. Here are your gloves, sir."

Sir Hugh took the gloves and left the room, with a grave, thoughtful, remorseful look upon his handsome face—a face which had grown haggard and pale during the last few days, and bore visible signs of unrest, which he tried to conceal under an appearance of gayety, which now, feeling himself unseen, watched, he had dropped. Those days which had been such happy days to Shirley Ross, as she dreamed her happy love dreams and smiled into her lover's eyes, had been days of intense agony to Sir Hugh Glynn. He, in general so careless and selfish and languid, had no repose night or day, no rest from the bitterness of his thoughts; he, who had been heartlessly selfish, and proud in a certain way of his heartlessness, who had smiled to himself at other men's weakness—he, Hugh Glynn, loved utterly as ever lover had loved, and in vain. It maddened him to think that the smiles for which he longed, the gentle words for which he hungered, the kiss for which he would almost have laid down his life, were all given to another, while he was rejected and almost scorned. At first his love had been a melange of desire, of admiration for Shirley's beauty, of pride piqued by her indifference; but now he loved her—not with the great, noble, unselfish love which Guy Stuart had given her, and which would have sacrificed itself unhesitatingly to her happiness, but deeply as he could love, with a passion which her indifference could not quell, but which opposition increased a thousand-fold. It was as much self-love as love perhaps, but it was a strong passion, and Sir Hugh had not power for resistance. She should be his, he swore passionately again and again in the long sleepless nights during which he paced his room in misery, by fair means or by foul; and, since fair means failed, since she loved Guy Stuart so deeply that nothing—Sir Hugh felt that to the depths of his passionate, aching, jealous heart—would tempt her from her allegiance, he would try foul.

But he had not yielded to temptation without a struggle; he loathed the means whereby he could steal her from Guy, he hated the man who had suggested those means, and yet, helpless against the torrent of his overwhelming passion, he was carried away so low as to think of treachery no dishonor if it would give her to him. He was thinking of those means now as he went slowly down the picture-gallery, drawing on his gloves and looking so handsome and distinguished in his faultless evening-dress; and Guy Stuart, leaning back in his corner of the railway carriage in which he was speeding towards Edinburgh, was thinking tenderly of the girl he had parted with so lately, and kindly of the friend in whose charge he had left her.

Lady Fairholme met Sir Hugh in the hall, looking stately and magnificent in her rich velvet dress with its trimmings of old point lace; and, while they were exchanging a few words about the music and the number of waltzes on the programme, which Lady Fairholme thought was too large and Sir Hugh considered not large enough, Alice came slowly down the stairs, looking very lovely in a dress of palest pink, with wild roses in her curly yellow hair.

Sir Hugh went forward to meet her with some empressement, but Alice, remembering the little firelit scene, the tall man's head bending low, and his lips touching the girl's slight hand, passed him with a quick reproachful glance and went toward her mother.

"Delphine wants your opinion, mamma," she said smilingly. "She says that Worth himself never made a prettier dress, and that you must praise her for it."

"It is very pretty, dear," Lady Fairholme allowed. "Sir Hugh, you are a better judge, perhaps, having seen more of Monsieur Worth's confections than I have."

"One forgets the dress," Sir Hugh began, as he bent his blue eyes on Alice for a moment in smiling admiration; but the girl turned away petulantly.

"How have I offended you," he asked her presently; "and why are you not wearing my flowers? I thought you would do me so much honor."

"You do not care whether I carry them or not," Alice said pettishly, "so long as Shirley carries those you sent her."

"How can you be so unjust?" Sir Hugh asked reproachfully.

"What can your cousin be to me but the fiancee of my oldest friend, and as such a very interesting person? May I tell Latreille to ask your maid for the flowers?"

"If I thought you cared," Alice began relentingly, dropping her eyes coquettishly, and then lifting them again to his face.

"You know I care," he said quickly, leaving her side for a moment to give the order to Latreille.

When he returned, Alice held out her hand to him to button one of her long gloves, and while he was bending over her wrist there was a soft rustle of silk on the stairs, and the patter of tiny high-heeled shoes.

"Here is Shirley," said Alice suddenly. "She does not look as if she were wearing the willow! Poor Major Stuart."

She was coming down slowly, fastening her gloves as she came, her eyes fixed on the little buttons, the long silken folds of her dress making a soft "swish" as they swept over the crimson carpet. Perhaps it was due to his having to stoop over Miss Fairholme's wrist that Sir Hugh's face flushed so darkly as he turned his eyes upon Shirley, his face was white as death, while it was with difficulty that he repressed the sudden passionate exclamation of admiration and love which rose to his lips. Alice Fairholme caught the swift gleam of longing which flashed into his blue eyes; and for a moment they both stood watching her silently, as she came. Hugh Glynn never forgot, even in the changes and misery of the future, how she looked then. It was the last time he ever saw her smiling and serene.

She was dressed in white; long spotless folds of lustrous gleaming silk fell straight and shimmering around her, cut square around her shoulders, where they were finished off with some soft old lace. There was not a touch of color anywhere, save in the vivid carmine of her lips; nor had she any jewelery. Her arms were bare above her elbow, and she carried a fan of carved mother-of-pearl and satin and Brussels lace which had been Guy's gift. Years after, Sir Hugh Glynn could have given every detail of the girl's dress, which seemed stamped indelibly upon his recollection. Never had she looked more lovely. Regret that Guy was not present to see her in her "silk attire" made her hazel eyes somewhat wistful and sorrowful, but the story her mirror had told her made her carry her pretty head haughtily erect, and there was a little triumph brightening her beautiful sad eyes. And, as he looked upon her, Hugh Glynn's heart beat high with passion and longing and love, and the last remnants of resistance under temptation fell away from him, and the tempter conquered.

"You might be wearing your wedding-dress, Shirley," said Alice carelessly; and at the heedless words the color rose, swift and scarlet, to Shirley's face, and Sir Hugh paled to the lips.

But there was no time to answer. One by one, in all the bravery of their dainty ball-dresses, the guests at Fairholme Court were coming down from their rooms. From the bachelors' wing, which could be reached by a staircase leading up from the smoking-room, the men sallied forth in their "war-paint," and presently the sound of wheels was heard in the avenue, and the band, concealed in a bower of greenery, struck up, and Shirley's first ball had begun.

CHAPTER XII.

The ball at Fairholme Court was like most other balls, especially those entertainments in the country where the town-bred langour has not yet penetrated, and where balls are not such common entertainments as they are in London during the season. The country people were well represented; there were plenty of pretty girls, and what is rarer still, of dancing men. Lady Fairholme was a charming hostess. Alice was in her element, dancing, and coquetting, and flirting, with Sir Hugh in constant attendance. Sir Gilbert moved among his guests, courteous, urbane, and a trifle pompous. Ruby Capel missed Oswald Fairholme from her gay court of admirers, and mentally inveighed against the exigence of Her Majesty's service in general, and Oswald's "chief" in particular, but enjoyed herself very much nevertheless. The music was excellent and the floor admirable, and altogether the ball was a success, and the new year opened right merrily at Fairholme Court.

The new year was about half-an-hour old when Sir Hugh at last was at liberty to leave the ball-room. He had been doing his duty manfully all the evening; he had danced and flirted and made himself generally very agreeable, and, although he had not danced with Shirley, he had managed to be near her very constantly, and had hovered about her with a gentle care and attention for which the girl was very grateful. She was not enjoying herself much, poor Shirley, for, as the evening wore on, she found herself thinking of Guy and his long cold journey and her excited imagination conjured up railway accidents and other troubles, until it required a constant effort to laugh, and smile, and dance, and it was a great relief to her when, profiting by a general exodus in the direction of the supper-room, she escaped from the ball-room and took refuge in the school-room, which, for the nonce, had been turned into a kind of supplementary cloak-room, where some of the gentlemen had left their plaids and overcoats.

It was very quiet and pleasant, Shirley thought, after the heat, and glare, and noise of the ball-room. The fire had burned somewhat low, for the household were all too busy to attend to their regular duties, and Shirley sank down before it into a low American chair, and crossed her little satin-shod feet on the fender, and closed her eyes wearily as she rested her pretty head against the cushion of her chair.

But she was not left long in solitude; the eager passionate blue eyes which had followed her so constantly yet so furtively during the whole evening had noticed her escape from the ball-room, and Sir Hugh had guessed where she would take refuge.

He had an excuse for seeking her, moreover, for that evening, just as they were entering the ball-room, a servant had brought Miss Ross a letter which had arrived by the evening mail, and Shirley had given it to Sir Hugh, smiling, and asking him to keep it for her until she was at leisure to read it.

"The postmark is Glasgow, and it is from Jack," she said lightly. "I suppose he is wishing me a very happy new year, but the good wishes must wait."

So the "good wishes" had waited until now, safely esconced in Sir Hugh's coat-pocket; but he thought that the time had come for them to be delivered.

So it happened that, while Shirley lay back on her cushions thinking of Guy, the school-room door was quietly opened and Sir Hugh's voice asked permission to enter, with a tone of entreaty which Shirley could not but hear.

She gave the permission very gently, and he came forward and stood beside her on the rug, leaning his elbow on the mantel and looking down at her with eager tenderness and longing; but Shirley did not meet his gaze.

"It is pleasant to get a little breathing-time," she said carelessly. "I don't think I shall care for balls very much."

"And yet you were looking forward so eagerly to this one!"

"Yes," she said simply; "but I did not think Guy would be away."

Sir Hugh's brow darkened. Guy—always Guy!

"It is a pity that old Jasper Stuart did not time his illness more conveniently," he said with a slight sneer; "he ought to have been more considerate. Shirley, are all your thoughts for Guy and Guy only?" he added almost despairingly, thinking that, if she would give him only one thread of hope at which to grasp he would abandon his fell purpose and trust that she might love him at last.

But the great grave reproachful eyes which were lifted to his for a moment were sufficient answer; for in them he read a love unchangeable, unutterable, which would be true to her life's end.

"Do you forget Guy's love for and trust in you?" she asked coldly. "I can not forget them, Sir Hugh, if you do."

"You must forgive me," he said, brokenly. "I am always offending you; but indeed it is very hard, and it is early days yet, you know. I have not got myself well under control. Even Guy would pity me if he knew how I suffer at times; but indeed—indeed I will conquer my folly and weakness."

The sweet hazel eyes were dim with tears then, as she looked at him for a moment.

"Sir Hugh, I am very sorry," she said, gently; and for a second he felt tempted to spare her—but only for a second. The next the trump cards of the game he was playing were put into his hand, and he could not resist the triumph they offered him.

"I will not distress you again," he promised. "By the by, I have some of your property to restore to you. Will you have your letter now?"

"Oh, thank you! Yes, I think I may indulge myself with five minutes' longer quiet," she said and took the letter from his hand. "Will you allow me?" she continued, smiling slightly, and Sir Hugh bowed a quiet acquiescence.

He had turned away from her as she opened the letter. The sight of her sitting there in her loveliness made the remorse which he could not quite cast away from him sting almost as keenly as Guy Stuart's trust had done. She was so fair and gentle, she was so compassionate for his pain, that he might have had compassion on her.

A slight cry, faint, terrified, anguish-stricken, made him turn quickly. Shirley had risen white as death, and, trembling in every limb, was looking with fixed staring eyes at her brother's letter.

"Good heaven, what is the matter? Are you ill?" he exclaimed, going to her side, and regarding her with intense anxiety. "Shirley, let me get you something—let me call—"

He was hastening from her side, when her voice—her voice, yet so unlike Shirley's sweet even tones in its broken hoarseness—arrested him.

"Get me nothing! Call no one!" she said, faintly. "Let no one come—"

He went to the door, locked it, and came back to her again. She seemed dazed and bewildered as she looked at him; the horror of some great trouble was upon her face, over which had stolen an ashen-gray tint, which robbed it of its brightness and beauty and startled him greatly, while her eyes looked up at him full of a bewildered pain pitiful to see.

"My child, my poor child, what has happened? What is the matter?" he said gently, only anxious now to soothe her; and at the anxiety and tenderness in his voice Shirley's composure failed. She sunk upon the seat from which she had arisen, and burst into a passion of tears, bowing her head in helpless anguish upon the arm of her chair.

Patiently, but with the same intense anxiety on his face, Sir Hugh waited; then, as the heavy sobs ceased, he said gently—

"What is it, Shirley? Your brother—is he ill?"

"No. Oh, Jack—oh, Jack!"

"He is not ill? Then there is nothing which need distress you like this," said Sir Hugh very tenderly. "Tell me what it is, my child, and let me help you."

"But—but—"

"But what?" he asked soothingly. "Don't let any fancied scruple prevent you, Shirley. You know that if I can do anything I shall be only too glad. Tell me, dear, what is it?"

She was lying back in the chair now, pale and exhausted, her lips quivering and the great tears still resting on her long lashes; she looked up at him piteously and shook her head with a weary little gesture of denial.

"Will you not tell me, Shirley? Remember, Guy left you in my care. How can I fulfil my trust unless you confide in me?" he said softly. "Forget all my folly, and remember only that he told you when he was leaving you, if anything went wrong, to come to me as frankly as you would go to him; "Shirley," he added, in earnest entreaty, "let me do what Guy would do if he were here now."

For one moment longer she hesitated the next she had put the letter, and with it the opportunity he needed, into his hands.

There was silence in the little room as he took it from her—silence broken only, as Shirley remembered afterward, by the hard patter of rain against the window-panes and the howl of the wind among the trees outside.

What it is to be Forty.

To discover a sprinkle of gray in your beard,
And a thinness of crop where the upland is cleared;
To note how you take to your slippers and gown,
And hug to the fire when you get home from town—
Ah, that's what it is to be forty.

To find that your shadow has portlier grown,
That your voice has a practical, business-like tone;
That your vision is tricky, which once was so bright,
And a hint of a wrinkle is coming to light—
Ah, that's what it is to be forty.

A sleigh ride, a party, a dance or a dine:
Why, of course you'll be present, you never decline;
But, alas! there's no invite, you're not "young folks," you see;
You're no longer a peach, but a crab-apple tree—
Ah, that's what it is to be forty.

A daughter that grows like a lily, a queen,
And that blooms like a rose in a garden of green,
A dapper young clerk in an ice-cream saloon,
Both a dude and a dunce is to carry off soon;
And a boy that is ton, and the pride of your eye,
Is caught smoking vile cigarettes on the sly—
Ah, that's what it is to be forty.

At twenty a man dreams of power and fame;
At thirty his fire has a soberer flame;
At forty his dreams and visions are o'er,
And he knows and he feels as he ne'er did before
That a man is a fool till he's forty.

The "Terror."

Little shoestrings all untied,
That make the tiny shoes go "flop,
A hat with half the rim torn off,
A hole that shows the curls on top.

But then beneath it such a face,
All roguishness and baby glee,
And dimples that play hide and seek,
Around the crimson mouth so wee.

And fingers—but why try to tell
Of all the mischief they contrive,
The doggie "could a tale unfold,"
And kittie now is not alive.

And is he wicked when he swims
Small chickens in the place of ducks?
Or when he sees the buds unfold,
Before the flower comes he plucks?

Or when he takes his sister's dolls
And pulls the "criers" in them out?
Or runs a pin in papa's watch
To see what little "ticks" about?

Oh, mother hearts, you'll take him in,
This naughty "terror," household joy,
Because in him you will but see
The picture of your own small boy.

"My House is Left Unto Me Desolate."

A little while, you tell me, but a little while,
And I shall be where my beloved are;
And with your eyes all large with faith, you say,
"Thy dear ones have not journeyed very far."

"Not very far." I say it o'er and o'er,
Till on mine ear mine own voice strangely falls,
Like some mechanic utterance that repeats
A meaningless refrain to empty walls.

"Not very far," but measured by my grief,
A distance measureless as my despair,
When, from the dreams that give them back to me,
I wake to find that they have journeyed there

"Not very far." Ah me! the spirit has
Had its conjectures since the first man slept.
But, O the heart, it knoweth its own loss,
And death is death, as twas when Rachel wept!

A Patent Nurse for Babies.

A most useful invention for nursery use, called a "baby washer," is announced, and the inventor describes his infant machine as follows:

You simply insert the begrimed infant in an orifice, which can be made any required size by turning for four minutes a cog wheel with electric attachments. The child slides down a highly polished plane. His lips are met at the terminus by an india rubber tube, from which the infant can draw lacteal nourishment of the purest and most invigorating character, secured for the special purpose at great expense from a choice breed of the Alderney cow. While in this compartment, which is plate-glass mirrored, the perturbed spirits of the infant are soothed by its frantic efforts to demolish its own image reflected in the glass, with a nickel-plated combined tooth cutter, nail knife, rattle and tack hammer, which is thrust into the baby's hand by an automatic monkey. Fatigued by its destructive efforts, the infant falls to sleep, while the organ attachments play softly the ravishing melody of "Put Me in My Little Bed." Then it slips into the third compartment. Here the body is washed. Another small tube administers a dose of soothing syrup, and the infant glides from the machine, its nails pared and its hair combed.—Christian Observer.

The Adventures of a Bustle.

It all happened in a big dry-goods house on Nicollet avenue yesterday morning, and the fact that there was no ice on its windows during the day can be accounted for only by the warmth of the victim's blushes. She is a clerk in one of the lower floor departments. Yesterday she over-slept, arose late, dressed hurriedly and forgot to put on her bustle. Her mother noticed the omission as her daughter turned for her cloak and said:

"Put it on over your dress, dear, and under your cloak; that will hide it until you get down town and you can fix it all right in the dressing-room."

Done as suggested. The acquaintances who met the sweet-faced girl on the street had no idea that trouble was brewing. But in the dressing-room she forgot; she took off her cloak and hat; she smoothed her hair; she went out to her place amid the throng.

There was a shout of laughter. The situation can be imagined.

She still had her bustle on outside her dress.

She will swear off on bustles.—Minneapolis Journal.

Prof. Malcomson, of Dallas, Tex., who is said to be a teacher of some learning, advances the theory that the earth is flat and also motionless, neither rotating on its axis nor revolving around the sun. He also believes that the sun and moon are smaller than the earth, and that the light of the moon is her own and not reflected from the sun.

The people of Two Rivers, Wis., witnessed a strange atmospheric illusion a few days since. A few miles out on the lake appeared a large schooner-rigged vessel, and, although there was no wind blowing, it went along as though every stitch of its canvas was being strained to its full strength; and, what was stranger still, it appeared to be ploughing its way through an immense field of ice. The vessel appeared to be deeply loaded, and was bound north. She was watched until she disappeared around the point.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Some Curiosities Among the Latest Fashions.

WOES OF THE OBLIGING STOREKEEPER.

A Terror of Storekeepers.

The cheeky woman whom I have now in mind is self-possessed, smiling and well dressed. She is the terror of storekeepers. Recently a specimen of this class had a piece of fine needlework that her own sewing machine could not do. She knew of one in the market that could, and so she went to the office, talked prices and quality, asked permission to try it on the spot, took a roll from her shopping-bag, stitched an hour till the job was done, expressed entire satisfaction with the machine and price, gave her name, street and number with an order for one of the best, and went her way. The agent never saw her again, and found no machine was wanted at the street and number designated. She would be horrified at the hint of shoplifting. Her little game is different. It is shop-borrowing. This same woman was invited to an out-of-town reception. She wanted a more elegant outside garment than her own for the occasion, and she got it. Going to one of the largest establishments, she tried on and tried on wraps, trying at the same time the patience of the saleswoman, as she always came back to one, the most elegant of the lot, and seemed just on the point of choosing it. Finally she begged permission to take it home to show her husband, feeling certain he would approve. The garment was sent home, was worn at the reception, and returned with a polite note and regrets that it was not found wholly satisfactory.

An Article of Many Uses.

What on earth our grandmothers and mothers ever did without kerosene oil is a wonder, says a thrifty housewife. Hardly a day passes that this article is not in requisition for some purpose. It is used in washing, clear starching, loosening screws and bolts, cleaning furniture, polishing windows; then medicinally for sore throats, externally, and for croup both externally and internally. But the best use that I have known it to come into was to take the rust from a stove that had stood through the summer and gathered a thick coating of red rust. Sand and elbow grease were applied most vigorously, but the rust held its own, when a bright idea suggested itself and was acted upon with perfect success. A cloth was dipped in kerosene oil and rubbed over the rust. After a thorough rubbing the stove was blacked, and one could never have thought but it was a span new baseburner. Not a particle of rust remained to tell the story. To what use this article will hereafter be called we cannot tell, but really a family could hardly get along in these times without it.

Latest Fashion Notes.

Evening basques are laced with narrow satin ribbon instead of cord.

Ostrich feather fans are not considered good style for debutantes. Theirs should be of cocks' plumes or else painted gauze.

Red linen handkerchiefs, blue-stitched, are worn with muffs in preference to the more delicate white cambric, which can scarcely touch fur without losing its purity.

The draped bodice will play an important part both for ball and dinner dresses; it is made of very soft silk, crape or similar clinging material.

Stout women wear drawers and chemise of fine French flannel, as they thereby attain the necessary warmth for cold weather without the extra bulk of wearing both merino underwear and muslin.

Buttons have lost their identity since the rage for braiding set in and are of little importance, being as quiet in style as possible. The favorites are the small bullet-shaped ones, crochet-covered, or else still smaller flat ones, covered with black silk.

A late fashion in Paris is that of wearing small birds' wings in the hair at the opera. Brunettes wear them dyed scarlet or gilded, while the blondes wear white, blue or pink. While it may be cruel it is at the same time exceedingly pretty and piquant in effect.

In addition to the brilliant red which, especially in cloth or flannel, is now so much used for children's dresses, have been seen some equally pretty frocks made entirely of blue. A dress of sapphire blue plush is trimmed with the long-haired black lynx fur. Gray cloth gaiters that button above the knee are worn with this costume

A pretty ornament for the hair is a "rose bow." The petals of the rose are formed of ends two inches long of green corded ribbon cut in sharp points at the upper edge. The petals are formed of many thick, soft loops of rose-colored satin ribbon and a few ends of gilt wire form the stamens. This is set on a long hairpin.

A distinguished-looking skating costume has a skirt of very heavy black faille francaise, edged with black astrakhan. The basque and drapery is of smooth dark-blue cloth, braided and edged with the fur. The bodice is fragged down the front, and there is a little toque and muff to match of the cloth and fur.

Flowers are revived for ball dresses and are made to appear as natural as possible, drooping from flexible stems and surrounded with natural foliage. They are made with the greatest care and come in sets consisting of a garland for the skirt, a corsage bouquet and a small cluster for the hair.

A novel hair ornament consists of small side combs, less than two inches long, made of real or imitation tortoise-shell, set with a sparkling row of rubies or other small gems, sometimes with a variety of colored stones. These combs are worn either at the side or in the coil of hair surmounting the forehead.

There is an effort being made just now to return to the old bow-knot method of dressing the hair, such as one sees in pictures of the fashions of 1821. It is rather a trying fashion, and only young fresh faces can stand it. All the tendency, though, is towards a high and extremely narrow effect, with one curled lock in the centre of the forehead.

In Paris they are dressing young girls in full plain skirts of figured materials, with low round gathered bodices, surrounded by a wide sash. Sandal shoes and high coiffure, with the hair combed off the forehead, make this costume still more like the fashions of the twenties, which are being industriously revived.

One of the newest creations of fashion is a bodice intended for ball-room wear, uniting the half high and half low in very pretty style. This low bodice seems to be made of flowers of light pinked silk ruchings, and the bodice proper goes over the shoulders in two drapings, which becomingly clothe the display of shoulders to which some people object.

A lovely evening dress has a skirt and bodice of yellow faille. The skirt is trimmed with flounces of yellowish blond embroidered with gold. The bodice is covered with gold-colored plaited crape, and the drapery is of the crape laid in loose, fine plaits in such a manner that the edges hang in fine points with fane-like effect. The top of the bodice is edged with gold lace

Children's dresses with white serge have a kilted skirt laid in a broad box plait in front, and have half a dozen rows of narrow crimson braid set on above the hem. The full blouse waist is gathered into a yoke, and there is a loose outer jacket which has three plaits on the front edge, and is bordered with the crimson braid. With it is worn a red Turkish tasselled fez.

The Best of Them All.

An English general in reviewing a corps of cavalry suddenly stopped before a splendid-looking fellow and asked abruptly:

"Which is the best horse in the regiment?"

"Number 10, sir,"

"What makes you think it is the best horse?"

"He walks, trots, and gallops well; is a good jumper; has no vice, no blemish; carries his head well; is in his prime."

"And who is the best soldier in the regiment?"

"Tom Jones, sir."

"Why?"

"Because he is an honorable man, is obedient, tidy, takes good care of his equipment and his horse, and does his duty well."

"And who is the rider of the best horse?"

"Tom Jones, sir."

"And who is Tom Jones?"

"I am, sir."

The general could not help laughing, but he gave a sovereign to his informant, who received it without moving a muscle.—John Bull's Army.

Girls as Reporters.

Oh, yes, dear, you can excel in news paper work! A girl makes just as good a reporter as a man. A great deal better, in fact. But then you will labor under some disadvantages, as a girl. When you are writing up a country fair, for instance, you can't smoke in the eyes of the good old lady who peeps over your shoulder to see what you are saying about her canned pears and home-made bread. And you can't very well prod a class superintendent in the ribs with a pencil and call him Say. And you can't sit on the parapet of the grand stand and let your feet hang over during the races. And you can't play billiards and drink beer. Oh, you can? Well, then, you'd better forget how, if you're going to be a reporter, else you'll never have time to do anything else.—Burdette.

He—Miss Julia—I have a confession to make. Will you hear it?

"The Scenes of My Childhood."

The bard was asked to compose a little poem on his childhood, and this is what he produced: "How dear to my heart is the school I attended, and how I remember, so distinct and dim, that red-headed Bill and the pin that I bended, and carefully put on the bench under him. And how I recall the surprise of the master, when Bill gave a yell and sprang up from the pin so high that his bullet-head smashed up the plaster above, and the scholars all set up a din. Hon. S. S. Cox began his response to the thanks of the House, Monday, by saying: "Mr Speaker: It has pleased the gentlemen to make me your locum tenens." After it was over O'Neill, of Missouri, interviewed Tim Campbell on it.

"And what the devil does locum tenens mean, Tim?" he asked, all in a puzzle.

"Don't you know that, John?" replied the New York statesman, with a touch of pity in his voice. "Why, that's Turkey for pro tem., of course."—Washington Critic.

All for Labor—in a Horn.

If any working people object to paying double prices for anthracite coal or sugar they will be informed by the "trust" organs and some of the labor leaders that the combination is necessary to secure good wages for the laborers. On which assertion the suspended sugar refineries and the idle anthracite mines afford an eloquently silent commentary.—Pittsburg Dispatch, rep.

An Awful Scare.

Society belle—Mother, Mr. DeBrass has proposed and I have accepted.

Mother—What? Oh, you wicked, ungrateful girl, after all we've done for you. Mr. DeBrass hasn't a cent to bless himself with and won't have until his father and grandfather die.

"The Mr. DeBrass I am referring to is the grandfather."

"Oh! bless you, my children."

A JUDGE ON SCANDAL-MONGERS.

The Men Who Besmirch Women's Characters.

Nuggets, whether of gold or of wisdom, are often found in most unsuspected places. The divorce courts furnish many nuggets of wisdom, suggesting, as such discoveries always do, that somewhere thereabout a paying mine might be found by an experienced prospector, who knows enough to know that these valuable condensations have gone through long years of flood and fire before they flashed into the sunlight. A nugget such as is mentioned turned up in Judge Tuley's court the other day, which has become a rich placer, full of pay-streaks and pockets. In the trial of a divorce case Judge Tuley said "it was very easy to blast a woman's reputation. An insinuating remark by a party to a suit, a sneer by a lawyer, or the stroke of a reporter's pencil could smirch irretrievably the name of the purest woman," and in his court, the judge said, "no woman's reputation could be attacked without giving her the best opportunity for disproving the accusation." Talmage, the brilliant and effervescent, might have found and displayed this nugget, but he would have garnished it with a blaze of glory and rhetoric. He would have set it in a flashing circlet of corruscating gems. He would have made it flame with lights phosphorescent, irridescent, but he would have added nothing to the value of the nugget, which, to some eyes, would seem better dressed in the rough and rugged garb nature gave it. No better test can be made of a man's innate character than the development of the spirit in which he, by word or wink, by nod or nudge, by smile or smirk, tampers with or tarnishes the reputation of one of his mother's sex. It is the old trick of a poltroon to build an ambush of hints, winks and insinuations and shoot envenomed arrows from behind it, and then slink away under cover. This was the method of certain savages, despised even by their barbarous neighbors. An eccentric old writer declared that a close acquaintance with any man would show what animal family he had descended from. The noble and brave showed the lion, the crafty and cunning the fox, the meek and humble the sheep, the greedy and avaricious the wolf. But there must be descendants from the skunk and the hyena. Somebody must originate the rumors no one is willing to father—which many repeat but no one affects to believe. Long ago the vile art of the insinuator was understood. The people who, with wise waggings of the head and "I could and I would," proceed to gloat over the ruined reputation of a defenceless woman lived and were feared and cursed before Aristophanes was born. There may be uses for vermin of all kinds, even vermin of society. Possibly they exist to compel us to cultivate the Christian graces, as bedbugs compel many a horrified housewife to do. But they ought to be poisoned all the same—poisoned early and often, for there is always a mystery as to where vermin comes from. If there is anything that establishes conclusively and irrefragably the doctrine of special and continuous creation, it is a bedbug. He is a great fact. He is in esse, not in posse. He does not evolute. He is here in defiance of embryology and Darwin. His environment is a matter of no consequence. He is not discussible. The only thing to do with him is to wage eternal, never-ending, relentless war to keep down the surplus, not with any hope of extermination. And so with that other vermin—the man that hints, that has heard, but don't know; that deals in "they says," that whispers and winks, that protests and prattles, and yet all the time is engaged in the shameful business of sowing evil seed by night in the field of his sleeping neighbor, too great a coward to take the risks of a burglar, yet willing to divide his spoil. It is against such creatures that Judge Tuley boldly erects the barriers of his high position; and he deserves all honor for it.—Chicago Times.

Finding the Sun in a Storm.

Reassuring.

Worried Wife Oh, doctor, what has detained you? I sent for you at 12 o'clock. My husband is very low, indeed.

THE DECLINE OF PAGANISM

Pure Paganism Now Predominates in No Densely Populated Part of the World

We may see on the map showing the distribution of religions that the areas in which purely pagan forms of worship still predominate is much larger than any of the areas in which other systems of religion prevail. We find, however, that this is so only because the vast but very sparsely settled northern portions of Siberia and North America are in the main inhabited by pagan peoples. A little study will show us that, except in equatorial Africa and among a few considerable tribes in South America, pure paganism, by which we mean rude and wholly uncivilized idolatry, now predominates in no densely populated parts of the world. We may notice also on our map bands of color in these pagan areas, indicating that other forms of religion are making headway there, and if we compare the map with others of earlier date, we see that the bands have been augmented in number and size, indicating the tendencies that justify the belief, now widely entertained, that the downfall of Paganism in every part of the earth is only a question of time. Many agencies and influences are contributing to this result. Any man, be he missionary, civil officer or trader, who destroys the faith of the savage African in the power of his medicine-man or in the efficacy of his fetich, overthrows the foundation on which his flimsy religious structure rests. Physicians all over the heathen world help to undermine Paganism by showing that their healing art is more efficacious than the invocations and mummeries of the fetich-maker. Governments are stepping in to destroy superstition and to put an end to the bloody rites of idolatry. England is stamping out on the lower Niger the custom of offering up human sacrifices for the sins of the people. Wherever its influence reaches, the Congo State is endeavoring to stop the poison ordeal prescribed by fetich men for the detection of witches, and is treating as murder the butchery of slaves to be the comrades of their masters in the other world. On Boma plateau there is a spot, regarded probably for ages as "fetich," which no native dare approach for fear of incurring the fatal ill-will of the spirits. Two months ago the Governor of the Congo State received the nine chiefs of Boma on this very spot. "The incident," says Le Mouvement Geographique, "will, it is believed, put an end to the superstition."

The whole of Borneo, the second largest island in the world, is now under European domination, and the terrible custom of head hunting, abolished through European influences in scores of smaller islands, is falling into desuetude in the great region where it has chiefly flourished. The British North Borneo Company treats head hunting as murder and hangs the offenders. The six years' experience of this company, says one of its agents, shows that some of the most important tribes have abandoned many barbarous and idolatrous customs. It is a noteworthy fact in the history of white enterprises in Borneo and in many other lands that the more hostile and savage a tribe may be in its benighted condition, the more faithful and friendly it becomes after yielding to better influences. There is an old saying that "all Africa dances when night comes." Wherever paganism reigns in the dark continent, the ever-recurring carousal by the light of the moon or a bonfire is the chief amusement of life. But in wide areas the noisy pleasures of the nocturnal orgy are no longer witnessed. Throughout the broad Soudan, stretching from sea to sea, are 60,000,000 blacks who now gather at nightfall, not to dance like their fathers, but to study the language of Mohammed and hear the Khoran read in the village mosques. The beating of tam-tam and the noise of revelry, so dear to every savage African, cease whenever Islam advances, and the hum of the school-room replaces the sound of rude festivity. Desirable as it is that the tenets of the prophet should make way for the more perfect teachings of Christianity, it is still a great blessing to many millions in Africa that through the impulse which Islam has given them they have reached a condition far preferable to the savagery of their fathers. Among the hundreds of islands that dot the western Pacific Christianity is winning an undoubted ascendancy over pagan forms of religion. It is a melancholy fact that here, as in some other portions of the world, paganism is dying out, partly because its adherents, unable to live in the presence of the stronger races, are rapidly perishing. On the borders of the northern ice zone signal triumphs have been won for Christianity. The entire tribe of Tukudh Indians on the Lower Mackenzie River are converts of the missionaries, and 6,000 people there profess the new faith that white philanthropists have brought them. Practically all the Eskimos of Greenland have been evangelized, except the handful of isolated Smith Sound natives and the few hundreds of east coast aborigines who are cut off from the world by an almost impassable ice barrier. Thus in every corner of the earth a variety of influences is destroying paganism, and, though Christianity is not everywhere taking the place of savage superstition, all the pagan world is gradually accepting systems of religion that possess some elements of progress and tend to benefit and uplift the most debased and unfortunate races.

San Francisco burglars last week stole $1,500 worth of jewellery from the residence of Chief of Police Crowley.

Some idea of the terrible difficulties with which the Italian expeditionary force on the Red Sea coast have to contend may be gathered from the fact that almost all the water for drinking purposes has to be brought at an enormous expense from Naples. Massowah, like Suakim and Aden, is almost devoid of water fit for human beings.

Already the spring fashions are beginning to be shown in the windows. Ginghams, muslins and sateens in all the light colors are shown, and dressmakers are employed during the dull season in getting them in readiness for warm weather. Round waists and shirred basques are the styles used for handsome embroidered robes. The round waist is without fullness on the shoulder, but is gathered into a belt back and front. Frequently a V of embroidery is let in before and behind. The plain material is then shirred next this V, both on the shoulders and at the waist line.

TWENTY YEARS AGO!

Gleanings From the Priceville "Courier," of April 17, 1868.

A great many people are not aware, that in Mr. S. L. M. Luke they behold one of the pioneer journalists of the County of Grey. He is now in the fruit tree and general agency business, but a quarter of a century ago he occupied a front rank in the newspaper publishing business. Before us, as we write, are fyles of the Durham Standard, which were placed in our charge by Mr. Luke some years ago; and it is safe to say, there is not a better edited or neater sheet, typographically, published in Grey at present time—with all our improved appliances and facilities. The Standard made its first appearance in 1857, over one year before the Editor of THE ADVANCE was born! It was an important factor in connection with the celebrated County Gravel Roads scheme.

Eleven years later, Loudon & Co. commenced the publication of a paper in Priceville, called the Courier, with Mr. Luke as Editor. No. 8 of that publication is before us. It was issued on the 17th April, 1868, nearly twenty years ago—the first number having been published exactly twenty years ago this week—and was a handsome newspaper. From No. 8 we take the following extracts:

FLESHERTON.

"The Village of Flesherton has a central position, good roads and surrounded by a fertile district and enterprising settlers. The Collingwood and Durham and the Toronto and Sydenham gravel roads meet at Flesherton, and a considerable amount of travel passes along these routes. The village is situate in the heart of the Township, and here the Municipal Council of Artemesia holds its sittings, and the Artemesia Agricultural Society its shows. The progress of the village has been rapid during the past few years. The grist and saw mills of Mr. Flesher atract considerable trade to the place, as well as well as the carding and fulling mill of Mr. Campbell, who has now, or is about to add additional machinery to his establishment. The stores are—Mr Richardson, Mr. Trimble, Mr. Wright and Mr. Jones, all "good men and true." The wagon and blacksmith shop of Mr. Heard is a credit to the place, and his persevering enterprise entitles him to a liberal patronage. Here you can have your work done as cheap and well as e'er was done in "Robin Tamson's smiddy," and with better grace, as the proprietor is not "an angry man," but kind and obliging. Mr. Clayton is the only boot and shoe shop of our acquaintance in the village where the "shoemaker sticks to his last," where a fit can be guaranteed, and the only authorized establishment entitled to use the old ditty:

> Blow, oh blow, ye heavenly breeze,
> Through among the leaves and treeses,
> Sing, oh sing, ye heavenly muses,
> While I mend your boots and shoeses.

The village has two hotels. "Mine host" of the Boyne Water is a good specimen of his craft, and a jolly good soul." [Here the ADVANCE finds the balance of the sketch torn out by the "wear and tear of time."]

ADVANCE readers are familiar with many of the above names—indeed quite a number of the gentleman mentioned in the above extracts from the Priceville Courier of April 17th, 1868, are among our most esteemed and valued friends and patrons. In looking over the advertisements in the same number of the Courier, from which we gather the above information, we find that Flesherton was well represented by the following gentlemen—who still carry on business here:—Squire M. Richardson, Squire Armstrong, Mr. J. H. Heard, Mr. R. Trimble, Dr. Christoe, Mr. A. Munshaw, Mr. W. K. Flesher. We also notice an "ad" from our old friend, Mr. R. McLean Purdy, Postmaster at Eugenia.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

THEY WERE TWIN BROTHERS.

One Suffered for a Crime that the Other Had Committed—A Resemblance So Striking that Even the Sweetheart of the Innocent Man was Deceived and Testified Against Him—He was Imprisoned, was Pardoned, and Now His Brother is to be Tried.

An Omaha, Neb., despatch says: Morrison Wilcox, Deputy Sheriff of Cattaraugus county, New York, passed through the city this morning en route to Olean, having in custody James Gregory Lafler, a prominent stock raiser, whose ranch is located near Watrous, N. M. The prisoner was handcuffed and huge steel shackles were clasped about his ankles. The crime for which Lafler is now under arrest is robbery and assault with intent to kill. The story of the terrible affair, as told to your correspondent by the officer, was a strange one.

Mr. and Mrs. Mason Lafler, parents of the prisoner, are respectable people living near Olean, N.Y. Twin sons were born to them, and when they grew to manhood their resemblance was so great that few people could tell one from the other. Both of them were sent to college, James choosing Cornell, and his twin brother, William, Yale. Both, after three years, left college and returned home. William took the management of his father's farm and James began the study of law in the village of Olean. It was the habit of the latter to spend Sunday at home, and on the evening of that day the brothers invariably spent a few hours at the house of a neighbor named John Clifford, a rich lumberman, who had two lovely daughters.

One Sunday night in June, 1882, a gentleman called at Mr. Clifford's and paid him nearly $8,000 in cash. This was done in the presence of both the Lafler brothers. Shortly after the twins departed for home. Between the hours of 2 and 3 o'clock next morning Mr. Clifford was attacked by a masked man and beaten into insensibility. The $8,000 which were hidden between the mattresses of the bed was taken and the robber started to make his escape. He was met in the hall by the youngest Miss Clifford, Wm. Lafler's sweetheart, and the girl with unusual bravery snatched the mask from the robber's face and exclaimed: "My God! Bill Lafler, what have you done?" The would-be murderer struck and then fled.

The next morning William Lafler was arrested and held without bail, charged with the burglary and attempted murder. Mr. Clifford finally recovered, and William was placed on trial. The main witness was his old sweetheart, who swore positively to identifying him as the robber. She was sure it was William and not James, as the robber was dressed in the same clothes William had worn the night preceding the crime, and which in material and style were radically different from those worn by his brother. In his own behalf William testified that he was innocent, and all he knew was that he had retired an hour after leaving the Clifford mansion on Sunday night. He had awakened in the morning with a terrible nausea and felt queer for two or three days. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty as charged, and the prisoner was sentenced to ten years' hard labor at Sing Sing.

While nearly every one believed William guilty, there was one firm friend who doubted it and tried to find out the truth. His investigation lasted nearly a year. His discoveries in brief were as follows: James at Cornell contracted many debts, which were paid shortly after the robbery. He had sent $2,000 to a Mrs. Coates, in Ithaca, as hush money for an assault on her daughter. On the Sunday night preceding the robbery James had purchased two ounces of chloroform at an Olean drug store, with which he undoubtedly drugged his brother. A hundred minor things were found out that proved the guilt of James Lafler.

Before the investigation was complete James left for a trip to New York. About two months later a report reached Olean that he had been drowned off Long Branch while yachting and that his body could not be recovered. A week afterwards a respectable looking man, giving his name as Alfred Thomas, appeared at the Lafler farm and confirmed the news. He brought with him certain papers that bore out his statement, and James was given up as dead. One day, about three years later, Olean and the surrounding country were electrified by the action of Gov. Hill, who issued a pardon for William Lafler, stating that he was convinced of the convict's innocence, and that he was positive that the crime was committed by his dead twin brother. The years passed on and the crime would doubtless have become only a memory but for the appearance of a man in Olean five weeks ago, who had a secret interview with the District Attorney. He informed that official that he was the man who had brought the news of James' death to the family six years before, and that he was paid by James to do it. He said that James was living, and was a ranchman located near Watrous N.M. A warrant was issued and the fugitive apprehended last Thursday. He stoutly denies his guilt, and says that he will be able to prove his innocence.

News Nutshelled.

Mr. Alex. F. Pirie, late of the Toronto Telegram, has accepted a position on the editorial staff of the Montreal Star.

THE LOCAL LEGISLATURE.

TORONTO, Feb. 15.—The Speaker took the chair at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Blyth moved for a return of copies of all Orders in Council with respect to the investment of sinking funds of municipalities under the provisions of the Municipal Act. He said that a few years ago, when the craze for railways was at its height, many of the municipalities granted large bonuses. These bonuses were secured in too many cases with little regard for the interests of the people, but with regard rather for the interests of the speculators who were concerned in the schemes. The sinking funds on these loans were coming in and it was difficult for the municipalities to find means of investing the money safely and profitably. An Order in Council gave authority to place the money in banks, and a good deal of money so invested by municipalities had been lost. By a change in the law power was given to invest in mortgages. But in making these investments the municipalities had to come in contact with the loan companies. It was well known that these companies had executive officers of great experience to manage the investment of their funds. But Municipal Councillors were elected from year to year and necessarily could not have the same experience to guide them in investing. Therefore, as a rule, they did not take advantage of this means of investing. He thought it would be well should the Government of the Province agree to receive the funds collected for the repayment of these loans, paying interest at 5 per cent. This would overcome the difficulties which at present existed. The information he sought by this motion, he believed, would furnish strong arguments in favor of the suggestion he made.

Hon. A. M. Ross said he supposed the motion was called forth by the unfortunate locking-up of the funds of the Township of Bentinck in a bank which had recently failed. He pointed out that there were several modes of investing county funds, and a very large latitude was allowed to the Councils to enable them to make safe and permanent investments. He believed, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's statement, that Municipal Councils had availed themselves to a large extent of the proviso allowing Municipal Councils to invest money on first mortgages on real estate. The difficulty of looking after a sinking fund might be obviated by having the debentures payable in yearly instalments, and this plan he believed would save both expense and trouble. He did not think it necessary for the Government to establish a sort of saving bank for the investment of municipal funds.

The motion was carried.

Mr. French, in moving the second reading of the Bill to amend the law respecting mortgages, said he had every confidence that the Bill was a good one, and would receive the approval of the House. It is well known, he said, that if I were to borrow money from you, Mr. Speaker, on my promissory note——

Mr. Meredith—You would never pay it. (Laughter.)

Mr. French—If that note was overdue, I would have the privilege of paying it at any time with interest for the time overdue. But if I gave you better security by a mortgage of my farm—if I had one—and the loan were three days overdue I would be obliged to give you notice of six months or pay interest for that time before I could compel you to take your money. This is a grievous burden upon the poorer class of borrowers, and, as you can see, must often work great injustice. There ought to be some simple machinery by which these "reasonable terms" could be arranged between the parties.

Hon. Mr. Mowat agreed that in practice the law worked harshly, and it did not seem fair that a mortgagee desiring to pay off a mortgage should be compelled to give six months' notice or pay interest for that time. If this Bill was referred to a special committee doubtless that committee would frame a clause fixing a time to meet the general opinion. Perhaps even a shorter period than three months might be fair in the case mentioned by the member for Hamilton (Mr. Gibson). He believed it quite proper that there should be some legislation on the subject, and suggested that the Bill should be sent to a special committee

The Bill was read the second time.

Mr. Lees (Lanark) moved the second reading of his Bill to amend the General Road Companies Act. It provided that on the application of one hundred ratepayers the Council shall appoint an arbitrator and the County Judge a second, and if a third is necessary he shall be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. These three are empowered to decide the bounds of the municipalities or parts of municipalities that shall be taxed to buy up the roads. If the County Council cannot agree with the road companies as to the value of the roads to be purchased, another arbitration is to take place under the Municipal Act.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Waters moved the second reading of a Bill to amend the Assessment Act. He explained that its objects were to abolish the poll tax, to abolish statute labor in certain cases, and to provide that the sum paid for commutation of statute labor should be paid to the overseers of high ways, and by them expended for the improvement of the roads. He argued that it was unfair to impose the poll tax upon young men who paid taxes indirectly by paying their board and lodging.

Mr. Meredith said that the poll tax was a reasonable thing, and that there had been no demand for its repeal.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Phelps moved the second reading of a Bill which provides that the salaries of police magistrates in Scott Act counties shall be $700 where the population is over 40,000, and $800 where it exceeds 50,000. The present salary is $600, irrespective of population.

Mr. Meredith opposed the Bill, arguing that it would retard the progress of the Scott Act to compel County Councils to pay an increased salary to police magistrates.

Mr. Smith, moving the second reading of his Bill to amend the Municipal Act, explained that it was intended to extend the local improvemement system to township municipalities. But it was believed that the frontage tax would not be just as a means of assessing for the cost of the works constructed. It was proposed, therefore, to authorize the assessment on a basis of acreage, those lands which received the benefit from the improvement to be assessed according to the benefit they received. He believed that the Bill was a good one and would receive the approval of the House. In reply to objections by Mr. Waters, he said that the Bill could be taken advantage of to promote selfish ends if a man could secure control of the Township Council, but he thought that that was a matter that might be left with the Township Council and the people.

Mr. Wood (Hastings) expressed fear that this measure would introduce in the townships the difficulties which had made themselves felt in this city over the local improvement question. He thought it would be better to depend upon the equity of the Council for the making of improvements

Mr. Phelps opposed the Bill and thought it should be withdrawn, as it was a bad Bill.

The Bill was read the second time and referred to the Municipal Committee.

The Bill to amend the Act incorporating the William Hall Peterborough Protestant Poor Trust (Mr. Stratton) was read the second time.

The House then went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Harcourt in the chair.

On the item covering the salary and expenses of detectives employed in the Attorney-General's department,

Mr. Meredith accused the Government of sending some of its detectives to work up cases of breach of the election laws against some parties for partizan purposes while leaving the gross corruption of their political friends in Glengarry and other places untouched.

Hon. Mr. Mowat said that it was the duty of officers under the department—the county attorneys—to prosecute in cases of breaches of the election law. But there was difficulty in securing the evidence. He was not in favor, however, of the Government detectives being employed in looking up this evidence unless there was special reason for it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knew of cases of detectives being at work such as he spoke of. It was lamentable, no doubt, the extent to which bribery had been practised. It seemed that the supporters of Liberal candidates had sought to learn a lesson from friends of gentlemen opposite. But he hoped that they would have learned that it was not only right but politic to avoid transactions of that kiud.

On the grants for schools.

Hon G. W. Ross (Middlesex) explained that the increase of $3,000 to schools in new and poor townships and unorganized territory was deemed just and advisable after careful consideration, especially in view of the extension of settlement in various directions. The money would be allotted to Public and Separate schools in the same proportion as the grant to other schools.

Mr. Wood (Hastings) expressed regret that the amount was not made larger.

Hon. G. W. Ross said there did seem to be a tendency to allow the Common School education to terminate with the fourth class, and the department could only resist that by pointing out the importance of maintaining fifth forms. Where they were required, as a rule, the advanced pupil obtained a better education in the High School than in the fifth form of the Public School. It had been said that the grants to Public Schools had not increased since 1876, while the grants to High Schools had increased 25 per cent. But it was to be remarked that the Public School attendance had decreased from 190,000 in 1876 to 187,000 in 1886, while in the same period the High School attendance had increased from 8,451 to 15,344.

The remainder of the items under the head of education were passed. The committee rose and the House adjourned at 9 p.m.

Mr. Tooley moved for a return of copies of the evidence taken by Mr. Emilius Irving, Q. C., with reference to the Ontario Grain & Seed Company, and of the report, if any, made by him with regard to the said company, its formation or operations. He said that the farmers had been defrauded of large sums of money, and that the Government deserved credit for appointing a commission to inquire into the matter.

Mr. Ingram said that farmers in his section had suffered severely from frauds in connection with grain seed.

Mr. Woods (Hastings) said the wonder was that anybody could be found so ignorant as to accept the promises which were made in connection with these seed grain transactions.

Hon. Mr. Hardy said he had noticed a case in which a person who had bought these receipts by wholesale had sued upon some of them and had been successful. He had been a little surprised by this result, as he had supposed that in such a case notice would be imputed to the party. It was not only ignorant persons who were deceived by these agents. He knew of a case where a very intelligent farmer had gone into the transaction, hoping to profit by it, and he must say that he did not consider him free from blame.

Mr. Meredith said he believed there was actually a case in which an agent for agricultural implements had been taken in. (Laughter.)

The motion was carried.

Mr. Ingram's motion for a return of fees paid to county officers in 1887 was withdrawn.

Hotel Customs in Japan.

"A friend of mine told me to-day that the hotels of Japan never have any hooks or nails for the patrons to put their clothes on," said a dissipated husband to his wife.

"Indeed? Well, you would feel perfectly at home there," she replied.

"How so?"

"Because whenever you come in at night you always hang your cloths up on the floor."—Hotel Mail.

The Princess of Wales pefers light colored dresses, even in winter. Her cashmeres and serges are trimmed with fur, but they are of some soft gray or brown tint, even in December. While at Sandringham she comes down to breakfast at a reasonable hour, and dispenses the tea herself—she is said to perfer this beverage to coffee even in the mornings—out of a handsomely chased tea service. The china, which is of the choicest, is all inscribed with the heir apparent's motto, "Ich Dien," and the table is always gay with flowers.

TRICKS IN ALL TRADES.

How a Quack Awed a Crowd and Sold His Patent Lung Healers.

A short time ago a quack experimented in Lambeth with considerable success upon the pockets of an awe-stricken crowd. After a preliminary harangue and a terse little lecture on the viscera, which the charlatan sketched in with colored crayons upon a blackboard on which the human skeleton was outlined in white paint, the fellow came to business. "I am going to demonstrate to you," said he, "by a startling experiment upon one of you bystanders that my miraculous remedy can cure all diseases of the lungs and chest. Now, whoever's got a bad cough or cold on the chest, let him stand forward." There was a little hesitation and a good deal of giggling. "Don't be afraid, my friends," said the quack, "it's all free gratis, for nothing. Let any afflicted person come forward and I'll show him the nature of his disorder and give him a packet of my lung healers for nothing." At last a man with a violent cold and cough came forward. The quack doctor pretended to sound his chest with a stethoscope of almost pantomimic proportions, and informed the staring crowd that the patient was in a galloping consumption.

"My friend," said the quack to the unfortunate victim, "so terrible is this disease that you can actually see it." He handed a glass tube to the patient and poured a pint of clear water into a large tumbler. "Just you blow into that water, my friend," he cried. The man obeyed, and the water grew discolored, turbid, and at last as white as if it had been mixed with milk. The patient became as white as ashes. "This unhappy man, my friends," said the quack, as he held the glass on high, "if he hadn't had the good fortune to come across me to-night wouldn't have been long for this world. I should have given him about a fortnight; that's all. Now a packet of my lung healers will cure him. What you see in the glass of water are his vitiated humors, the products of corruption. My magic lung healers destroy these humors in the body or out of the body. Observe, my friends, watch me carefully, there is no deception here." The quack dropped a pinch from one of a packet of powders into a glass and directed the patient to stir it with the tube. The water became immediately clear. Then he reaped his harvest. The water was lime water, and the carbonic acid in the man's breath naturally threw down the carbonate of lime at once and rendered the water turbid. And the miraculous lung healer was simply a little citric acid and sugar, which instantly redissolved it.—Saturday Review.

Mr. Waddell was for many years a large purchaser at Merryton sales, and his name will ever be associated in Clydesdale annals with the famed 100 guinea colt, Duke of Hamilton, 2,074, purchased by him at the sale of 1878.

Mr. W. F. Skene, Historiographer-Royal for Scotland, was on the 31st ult. presented with his portrait by a number of gentlemen who wished to show their regard for his worth and esteem for his personal character. The Lord Justice General made the presentation. In reply Mr. Skene gave some interesting details regarding the production of his great work, "Celtic Scotland."

The Evil of Chewing Cloves.

When I first smell cloves on a man's breath my first thought is: "That man is a fool." He thinks he is concealing the smell of whiskey or some other vile smell, and he is only advertising it. There is another reason also why he is a fool. The oil of cloves, which is expressed from them by chewing them, is an active solvent of the enamel of the teeth. Any one who chews cloves will soon notice that it makes the teeth tender. That means that their enamel is disappearing, and the next step is a mouthful of decayed teeth, which all the odors of Araby the blest can never sweeten. When will people learn that the sweetest and rarest smell of all is no smell at all?—Chicago Journal.

Mrs. Jacob Condon, of Reed, Pa., dreamed that her baby was burned to death, but in the morning when she told her husband of the dream he laughed at her fears. Late in the afternoon the child's clothing took fire at an open grate, and before the flames could be smothered the infant had been so badly burned that it died soon afterward.

MARRIAGE.

It Seems to be Going Out in Europe and Great Britain—Some Startling Results.

The numbers who marry seem to be steadily decreasing. The figures supplied under the head of International Vital Statistics, which are tabulated from returns furnished by the authorities of various European States, show an all-round fall in the proportion of marriages.

The falling off in 1886 below the average of the twenty years in 1861-1880 is very marked, although not so great as the difference between the rate of 1866 and 1886. Here, for instance, are the three sets of figures:

	England.	Scotland.	Ireland.	France.	Belgium.
1886.....	17.5	14.7	10 8	16.0	15.7
1861-80..	16.4	14.2	9.8	15.8	14.8
1866.....	14.1	12.4	8.4	14.8	13.4

There are three notable exceptions to the uniform decrease of the marriage rate, but they are easily explained. In Prussia, in Austria and in Italy the marriage rate of 1866 was distinctly below that of 1886. The secret, of course, is that in 1866 the three States were at war and campaigns and matrimony do not go well together. Italy alone of the great European States keeps up her marriage rate. It averaged 15.2 for eighteen years; it was 15.6 in 1886. In this she resembles Sweden. But the other States show the same phenomenon:

	Denmark.	Switzerland.	Austria.	Germany.	Holland.
Average 20 years..	15.3	15.1	17.1	17.4	16.2
1886.....	14.2	13.7	15.5	15.8	13.9

These figures all point in one direction, and all tell the same tale. Europeans are not such a marrying people now as they were twenty years ago, and among the marrying peoples we are nearly at the bottom of the tree. The Irish marriage rate is in itself enough to account for much of the misery and unrest of Erin; and the Scotch rate is lower than that of any nation in Europe. Our marriage rate is now lower than it has ever been since 1838, when the statistics were first collected on a scientific basis. The average for quinquennial periods which fluctuated from 15.6 in 1838-40 to 17.2 in 1851-5 has gone down steadily since 1871-5, and is still tending downward.

Another fact which no doubt explains one cause of the falling away in the marriage rate is that people, if they do not postpone marriage altogether, postpone it as late as possible. That is to say an increasing proportion of the years of human existence are spent outside matrimony. The mean age has been steadily rising since 1873, and the mean age of 1886 is the highest yet recorded, being 28.2 for men and 25.9 for women. The average age at which the professional and independent classes marry is 31.22 for the man, 26.40 for the woman.

Of course the meaning of the postponement or the rejection of marriage is the increase of prostitution. No one will pretend that the average man in these latter years has become more ascetic, more continent, more severe in holding his senses under control. The tendency has rather been the other way. A celibate population is not, as a rule, a chaste population, but rather the reverse. To postpone marriage is to increase prostitution, and that often of the worst kind. For it is interesting to note that the postponement and partial abandonment of marriage has not had, as might have been expected, its natural result in the increase of illegitimate births. If marriage had been succeeded by concubinage of the higher order, where the union, although not permanent, has still sufficient human relationship about it to surround the partners with the redeeming influences of children, the falling off in the marriage rate would have been accompanied by the rise pari passu of the number of children born out of wedlock. The very reverse is the case. The marriage rate in 1845 was 17.02, and the illegitimate births 2.3 per 1,000, while in 1886, with a marriage rate of 14.1, the illegitimate birth rate had fallen to 1.5. The proportion of illegitimate births in every thousand births was 65 in the ten years between 1851 and 1860. It was only 47 in 1886. Putting it roughly, prostitution is elbowing matrimony out of the field.

Apart altogether from the question of vice, and looking at the subject solely from the point of view of human happiness a more melancholy conclusion could hardly be arrived at by the pessimist than that which—born optimists as we are—seems to be deducible from the Registrar's figures.—Pall Mall Gazette.

McGarigle Enjoying Himself.

A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune tells all about McGarigle's goings on at St. Catharines. The despatch says: Mac is enjoying himself these cold wintry days sleigh-riding. On one occasion he was accompanied by Capt. Wm. McEvoy, formerly captain of St. John's boat, the schooner Blake, but now proprietor of the livery stables where McGarigle gets his horses for sporting around. Another way McGarigle has of enjoying the freedom which Canada affords to American boodlers is shooting. He, with Fred. St. John and A. Woodruff, was enjoying a rabbit hunt in the swamps and lowlying districts around the village of Marshville, some thirty-five miles southwest of this place, a few days ago. The report that McGarigle presided over a banquet of his friends at the Welland House a few nights ago is prettly well founded. The fact that Capt. J. Irving, skipper of the Blake; Fred. St. John, barrister, of this city; Mr. Patterson, one of the counsel for the defendant in the Dr. St. John trial; a friend named Woodruff, and two Chicago men, supposed to be lawyers or friends of McGarigle from that city, were all seen at the Welland House on the night in question coincides with the rumor, and it may reasonably be supposed that Mr. McGarigle was present.

Russian observations have shown that teeth decay in a quite regular order, the lower third molar being the first attacked, then the upper, then the lower fourth molar and so on, the lower incisors and canine teeth being the last affected. Upper teeth, as a rule, are more durable than lower, right than left, those of dark persons than those of blondes, those of short persons than those of tall.

Blizzards Hard on Smokers.

One of the coldest days recently, pedestrians on Clark street stared in amazement at a big man who shuffled along apparently nearly overcome with heat. He carried an enormous coonskin coat on his arm, his big fur cap was pushed back from his forehead, his coat was unbuttoned, and the perspiration stood in beads on his brow. He was looking anxiously at the store windows, as if in search of something that he'd got to have, and have right off. Along about Washington street he gave it up as a bad job, and tackled a shivering Chicagoan who was hidden in a fur collar, and was trying to keep from freezing to death.

"Say, stranger!" he remarked feebly, wiping his forehead with the back of his hand, "kin ye steer me onter somethin' coolin'—soda water or sech like? I'm clean done up with the heat."

The Chicagoan was too much astonished to reply and stared blankly at the speaker.

"What's the matter with this here durn town, anyhow?" continued the big man, taking off his cap and unbuttoning his vest; "all the soda water masheens is done up in tisshoo paper, an' durn if I kin find so much ez a drink o' ice water. I sh'u'd think sech hot weather ez——"

"Hot weather!" broke in the other man. "For the Lord's sake man, it's five below!"

"Gosh! is it hot's that?" said the big man, mopping his face and moving into the shade.

"Where'd you come from, anyway?" asked the Chicago man in an awed tone.

"Dakota—an' in the last blizzard I wuz——"

"Oh, I see," said the Chicagoan, "been pretty cold up your way lately, and you ain't used to our mild climate."

"That's it, that's it," responded the Dakota man, drawing himself up with conscious pride. "Why, in the last blizzard 'twas so cold I didn't have a smoke for near a week."

"How's that?" asked his hearer. "Cigar freeze while you were smoking?"

"Oh, no; but it took a steam grindstone four days to light a match."—Chicago Tribune.

No Shop Girls in Cuba.

One class you will miss in Cuba—not only in shops, but everywhere else—is the women workers. The most sensible and often the handsomest of women can be found occupying places of trust in American mercantile establishments and offices. In all Havana but one place is noticed where white women are employed. This is at a modiste's on Calle de Obispo; and these are a scraggy lot indeed. Women in Cuba are ladies, washerwomen or demi-monde. Shopping is done by the fair senoras or senoritas in the afternoon, and one will then certainly see beautiful women. They are neither flippant or trifling in their purchases, as in some countries. No salesman would dare gossip with them, suggest for them, or chattingly enter upon discussion of their affairs. Nor do they inform shopkeepers of their own or their neighbors' intentions. They seem to know just what they want and go straightway and get it. The turnouts are very gay; thousands of women meet, mingle and pass greetings; but there seems to be a general understanding here that a shop is not just the place in which ladies should entertain one another.—Albany Argus.

In Nell Gwynne's Old House.

Mr. John Pender, the "cable king" of England, who has just been knighted by the Queen, is well known in America through travel over here and the splendid hospitality he has extended to representative Americans at home. Sir John's town house is one of the oldest in London, and was built for Nell Gwynne by Charles II. It has a castellated front and a courtyard, which you enter through a little door in a great stone wall. The back of the house is smothered in ivy and faces on Green Park. —Philadelphia News.

Cross-Eyed.

A gentleman entered the street car with one eye looking forward and the other eye looking nowhere in particular, when a small boy exclaimed:

"Oh, mamma, jes' see that man's eyes. He's looking out of both sides at once."

"Hush, hush, Johnnie. How often must I tell you not to notice a man's infirmities. He's cross-eyed."

The little fellow was silent for a moment, and then softly inquired:

"But, mamma, am I cross-eyed when I'm cross?"—Detroit Free Press.

Long cloaks are made in a loose shape that follows the outlines of the figure in a graceful fashion, and is also more comfortable than the closely fitted garments. There are but four forms in these cloaks, two in front and two behind, making a sacque-like garment, and the sleeves are cut with long points.

Thousands of blind crows were seen in the woods and fields near Chattanooga recently, and people had no difficulty in approaching and seizing them. No one knows what caused their blindness. A similar phenomenon was oberved there three years ago, when so many blind crows were seen around the city that the ground was black with them, and thousands of them died of starvation.

THREE MILES UNDER WATER.

How Living Things Are Brought up From Ocean's Depths.

Americans have made a number of improvements on the apparatus used on the Challenger expedition for deep sea explorations, says the Washington Star. To send down a dredge or net to the bottom and haul it up again was the work of a whole day on the Challenger; and then if the net did not happen to strike the bottom right it would come to the surface empty. By the use of wire cable and improved apparatus for winding the Albatross party can make two or three hauls a day. Alexander Agassiz devised a new beam trawl net that would never miss fire, or so constructed that on whichever side it fell it would do effective work. Such a net is lowered from the vessel into the sea. To the line is attached an apparatus that gives notice when the net reaches bottom. When this occurs more line is paid out to give full scope to the net. Along the line at regular distances are attached weights that lie at the bottom. When all is ready the steamer is slowly backed until the net has been dragged a distance of a quarter of a mile or more over the bottom of the ocean. The weights along the line keep the cable down against the bottom for some distance ahead of the net, so the net is dragged lying flat on the floor of the sea. When the net is hauled up it is sure to contain some fish from the bottom. The net has a mouth or opening like the inverted cone of an eel pot, so that fish easily find their way in; but once in cannot find their way out. Occasionally fish brought to the surface this way will be still tremulous with life, but most of them are as dead as a fish can be, as dead as a man would be if some fisherman on the moon cast a net to the earth and dragged him up into the airless spaces above our atmosphere. Some of these fishes are brought up from a distance of three miles. The Challenger captured specimens from a depth of 2,900 fathoms. The deep sea dredging parties of the United States Fish Commission have gotten specimens from a depth of 2,940 fathoms. These deep sea fish are many of them bizarre in appearance. One thing contrary to the fairy tale notions of the sea depths is that there is no great variety or brilliancy of color. This simplification of colors is attributed to the absence of sunlight. The colors are generally dark brown or black or a silvery white. The oddness of the fish is in their shapes and peculiar development of their organs. There are some of them with huge heads and little bodies; others with tiny skulls, but mouths so huge that the lower jaw seems to be pivoted in their stomachs; some with great tigerish-looking teeth; some with immense round eyes; others with little pin points of eyes and others with no eyes at all. All of these fish, and 450 kinds have been found and described by the scientists of the Fish Commission, have long Latin names. It may be said to the credit of the fish that they are not responsible for the names, as they were contented to go without names until the Fish Commission net brought them to the surface.

Contagion of Yawning.

There has been an amusing discussion lately in Paris on the subject of hissing at theatres. It is interesting to note that an attempt made in the last century to put a stop to the practice proved a disastrous failure. The edict had hardly gone forth, under the auspices of the chief of police, when a first performance came off. A gentleman who was addicted notoriously to hostile demonstrations was "sandwiched," by way of precaution, between two agents of the law and soon the curtain rose. Every eye was directed toward the inveterate delinquent; but, to the general surprise, he sat still without making a sign. Ere long, he began to yawn, and soon the two policemen took to yawning in sympathy. Their neighbors unconsciously followed suit, the contagion spread, and in a short time pit, boxes and galleries were yawning as they had never yawned before. Even the actors, with their gaze fixed on the public, could not resist the example set them, and the unlucky author had the misfortune of hearing his most telling "hits" launched forth amid a perfect chorus of yawns. The embargo against hissing was promptly removed, it having been found by experience that a return to the old system was infinitely preferable to the new one inaugurated by the irrepressible Chevalier de la Morliere, who made a perfect specialty of his demonstrations against new plays at the Comedie Francaise, and had particularly distinguished himself by the uproar he created at the first appearance of Voltaire's "Tancrede."—St. James Gazette.

Out of the Ordinary.

"Say, Jim," said Jobkins to his bibulous friend, "come into the office and I'll give you a drink of something that is out of the ordinary run." Entering, Jobkins stepped out for a moment and returned with a glass of clear-looking beverage, which he handed to Jim. "Bah! That's water, ain't it?" said Jim in disgust. "Yes," replied Jobkins. "I drew it out of the faucet—that's the ordinary run, you know."

FROM THE COMING NEWSPAPER.

How the News of the Day Will Read When Journalism With a Big "J" Prevails.

Murder.—We are informed on credible authority that a murder occurred in this city last week. Although on general principles we are opposed to personalities we venture to give the names of the parties participating in the affair. Mr. John Smith, it is said, carefully disassociated the head of Mr. John Doe from the body with which it had been previously connected, the act resulting in an extinction of consciousness on the part of the latter, and the almost immediate cessation of animated activity—in other words, Mr. Doe expired—died, so to speak. Although apologizing for the personality, we make bold to say that such a murder as this is culpable; and though Mr. Smith, who committed the deed, possesses many worthy traits of head and heart, we are yet constrained to say that this specific act of his is—with proper reservations for aggravating circumstances—a reprehensible, and, to a certain degree, an unjustifiable one. If this language seems harsh or unfeeling we shall be glad to apologize for it in our next issue.

Fire.—The residence of Mr. James H. Peters, of Staten Island, was burned to the ground last night, and Mr. Peters and his wife, with their four children, lost their identity in the conflagration; and, in short, their separate individualities were annihilated by the chemical activity of the combustion. They were, to use a vulgar phrase, "burned up," and no trace of them as distinctive personalities has yet been discovered. It is said that the conflagration was started by Mr. Elihu J. Jones because Peters refused him (Jones) the loan of his (Peters') hatchet. We do not wish to speak with undue severity in the matter, but we do venture to say that this act of Mr. Jones, if it does not merit the severe term of misdemeanor, yet certainly was an indiscretion. A young man like Mr. Jones should beware of beginning life with such escapades, comparatively innocent and harmless though they may seem. It is these little things which gradually lead on and on until the hardened criminal will not scruple to contradict an editor or even speak disrespectfully of an alderman.

Accident.—A train of cars was precipitated yesterday from the elevated track near One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street. We were informed that thirty persons perished. Of course we shall publish no details of the event, as we are opposed to cheap journalism. But we are much pained to learn that several persons have so far forgotten the first principles of good breeding as to actually manifest an interest in the affair.

Assassination.—We are informed that the President was instantly killed yesterday by an assassin. Beyond this simple announcement we shall not further allude to the subject. But we cannot speak too severely of the extreme vulgarity that has been manifested in many quarters by low-toned and ill-bred people who have evinced a most trivial curiosity to learn the details of the vulgar affair.

Elopement.—The wife of the editor of this paper eloped with the coachman early last evening. We have been much disgusted by the vulgar curiosity of well-meaning friends, who, strange as it may seem, actually take an interest in the event. Our long journalistic experience has taught us never to manifest an interest in anything.—Boston Blade.

Great Bridges.

The Tay Bridge, which was destroyed by the hurricane that memorable Sunday night, Dec. 28th, 1879, was re-built in a much stronger form and opened last June, six years after the engineer's plans were approved. The Forth Bridge has now been building more than five years. But the two bridges are very dissimilar. The Tay Bridge, it is true, is half-a-mile longer than the Forth Bridge; on the other hand, it is not much more than half as high, and is simply a series of piers stretching across the comparatively shallow estuary, whereas the Forth Bridge, owing to the much greater depth of the water to be spanned, presented engineering difficulties far more difficult to surmount. That these difficulties are now in a fair way to be conquered satisfactorily is one more feather in the cap of the British engineer and his helpmate, the British constructor. Here are a few figures by way of comparison:

Forth Bridge	8,091	1,710
Tay Bridge	10,780	245
Niagara Bridge	808	808
Landore Bridge	1,760	110
Crumlin Bridge	1,800	150
Britannia Bridge	1,511	460
Brooklyn Bridge	5,862	1,600
Charing Cross Bridge	1,365	154
Westminster Bridge	1,160	120

These are some of the mammoth bridges of the world. I have not at hand particulars of the great Alexandra Bridge over the Chenab in India, besides which others like the Victoria, at Montreal, the Tyne Bridge, at Newcastle, the Albany Bridge over the Hudson might be mentioned; but I believe I am correct in saying that the two great arch spans of the Forth Bridge, 1,710 feet each, are beyond any span hitherto attempted. Each is 110 feet wider than the central span of the great Brooklyn Bridge, and when I point out that each will be a good hundred yards wider than the whole length of Charing Cross Bridge, Londoners may begin to form some idea of their magnitude. To cross a space half as wide again as the Thames at a single leap is "no sae bad," as the Scotch say. Two of these leaps, and two others half as long, represent the cantilever portion of the Forth Bridge.

One of the most curious of natural phenomena is a boiling fresh water spring right in the Atlantic Ocean. This spring is situated about seventeen miles southeast from St. Augustine, Florida, and about four miles out from the coast. The diameter of the boil is about fifty feet and it is so forcible as to make it a difficult matter to keep a good-sized schooner on or near it. The water is fresh, almost drinkable. Soundings have been made in it, but the force of the water throws the lead out one side or another.

SUPERSTITION IN TORONTO.

A Lady who Believes that Disease Can Be Charmed Away by a Hangman's Rope.

"I will tell you a peculiar thing," said Governor Green, of the Toronto jail, to an Empire reporter on Saturday. "It is about the rope which was used to hang Bennett, for the murder of Hon. George Brown. About three years ago two ladies visited the jail and inquired for me. I asked what I could do for them, when one of the ladies said:

"Mr. Green, will you grant me a favor?"

"I certainly will if it is within my power," I replied.

"Well," said the woman, "I wish to know if you have the rope that was used to hang Bennett." I said I had it. She said:

"I have a very dear friend dying with quinsy, and I have heard that if I could get a piece of the rope used to hang that man and apply it to my friend's neck the disease would be charmed away." I looked at the woman in astonishment and I said to her:

"Do you really believe what you say?"

The woman replied with much fervency: "Yes, I do believe it, Mr. Green, and my friends also believe it. Please comply with my request."

I said: "Well, you shall have a piece of the rope."

I hunted up the rope and cut off a piece by the knot, and gave it the woman. She then hurried away with her companion, apparently very much pleased. I have not yet heard whether the charm worked or not.

In Japan the old-school physicians are permitted to wear only wooden swords. This is a gently sarcastic way of expressing the opinion that they kill enough people without using weapons. But the druggist who introduced Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery into the Empire carries a fine steel blade. It was found that all who tried this wonderful remedy for coughs, colds, consumptive tendencies, blood, skin and liver troubles, were, without exception, greatly benefitted. The Mikado himself is said to have "toned up" his system by its use, and the importer was therefore permitted the exceptional honor of wearing the sword of the nobility.

The Month of Colds.

A physician in the American Magazine describes February as the time of saturnalia of colds. He advises extra effort to guard the space between a man's coat collar and hat brim. Beneath this exposed skin lies the cerebro-spinal axle, whence proceed the nerves that govern both heart and lungs. The face is supplied with blood-vessels twice as plentifully as the neck, enabling it to resist external cold in that proportion. For diet in February he advises fatty food and fresh lettuce and spinach, anti-scorbutics, which should be eaten freely.

WHAT AILS YOU?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Disease, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

Dr Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

CURES ALL HUMORS,

from common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-Joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands. Send ten cents in stamps for a large Treatise, with colored plates, on Skin Diseases, or the same amount for a Treatise on Scrofulous Affections.

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse it by using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, vital strength and bodily health will be established.

CONSUMPTION,

which is Scrofula of the Lungs, is arrested and cured by this remedy, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease. From its marvelous power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now world-famed remedy to the public, Dr. Pierce thought seriously of calling it his "CONSUMPTION CURE," but abandoned that name as too restrictive for a medicine which, from its wonderful combination of tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, anti-bilious, pectoral, and nutritive properties, is unequaled, not only as a remedy for Consumption, but for all Chronic Diseases of the Liver, Blood, and Lungs.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Severe Coughs, and kindred affections, it is an efficient remedy.

Sold by Druggists, at $1.00, or Six Bottles for $5.00.

Luxuriant Hair
Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

If you want to have a jolly laugh, go and hear Jim Fax, the "Funniest man in Canada," in the Town Hall, Flesherton, to-night.

NOTICE.—All parties indebted to me by note or book account will please call and settle the same without fail on or before the 15th of this (March) month. —J. W. BATES, Flesherton.

Remember the Orange Soiree in 4th line, Artemesia, lodge room to-morrow (Friday) evening. Tea served from 5 to 7 o'clock. Addresses by Revs. Wilson, Corcoran and Shilton, recitations, &c. Admission 25 cents, children under 12 years of age, half price. See bills.

The undersigned having disposed of their butchering business in Flesherton to Blakely Bros., trust the liberal patronage hitherto extended them will be continued with the new firm. At the same time they desire a prompt settlement of all outstanding accounts before last of this month.—PETCH & MITCHELL.

Messrs. Joseph and James Clark—sons of our esteemed citizen, Mr. W. M. Clark—have purchased the Pickering News printing plant and will publish that journal in future under the firm name of Clark Bros. Both young men are well and favorably known around here. We wish them unbounded success.

Blakely Bros. have bought out the butchering business of Petch & Mitchell in Flesherton, and solicit a share of the public patronage. Both young men are well known to every person in this section and ought to do a good business. At the same time we regret the departure of Messrs. Petch & Mitchell from our midst. They were thorough good business men and by their honorable dealings with the public had won for themselves an excellent name throughout the entire community.

To Whom it May Concern.

It having been publicly stated that I had given currency to a false report—in which Mr. James Best was accused of stealing or attempting to steal cattle, and to which latter reference was made in THE ADVANCE—I take this opportunity to say that the statement is misleading and false. I simply said that I had heard that James Mills got two head of cattle at Mr. Best's, and that Mr. Best had told Mr. Mills that if he (Mills) gave him (Best) fifteen dollars he would tell the former where his cattle were; also, that Richard Campbell said that James Mills went to McDonald's—to whom Mr. Best sold a steer—and that he (Mills) said it was his steer. This latter is the sum and substance of what I did say about the matter, and my informant was Mr. Matthew Leech.

Hear the Beethoven Quartette in Town Hall, Flesherton, to-night.

Mr. Loucks is building a reserve dam in connection with Little Mills, which will greatly increase his facilities for grinding.

NOTICE.—The new Roller Mill, Flesherton, starting operations to-day. Look for advertisement next week.—WM. BRADLEY.

Sneak thieves are numerous around Flesherton Station of late. Whips are stolen from sleighs at nights while the drivers are waiting for passengers on the trains.

Correction.

It wasn't a "Kimberley Thief," who stole Mr. McConnell's oats and grass seed, but a man who was traced up the mountain to the seventh line—away from Kimberley altogether.

Fire Number Two!

A fire broke out in the roof of Mr. Joseph Smith's shop, Flesherton, on Monday morning last about half past seven o'clock. Most of the contents were saved but the building and a quantity of leather were destroyed. A defective flue was the cause. There was no insurance. This makes the second fire in eighteen years.

Orange Soiree at Eugenia.

A grand Orange Soiree and Concert will be held in the Orange Hall, Eugenia, on Friday evening, March 16th, under the auspices of L. O. L. No. 1118. Tea will be served from 5 to 7 o'clock, after which an excellent program of speeches, dialogues, recitations, vocal and instrumental music, will be presented. Admission 25 cents, children under 12 years of age, 15 cents. See bills.

Our Roller Mill is Running!

The Flesherton Roller Mill is running in full blast and with all the very latest improvements in machinery, will turn out a very superior class of Flour. I have been appointed agent for Flesherton; send your orders in to me direct and they will receive prompt attention. Shop next to Russell's noted jewelry store, Flesherton.—S. SPIRIT.

Obituary.

It is our sorrowful duty this week to announce the demise of the town of Markdale, aged——! It was born too soon, and—worse than all—Mr. Mowat sat upon it! This was "the most unkindest cut of all," and it is needless to add, that the sickly infant succumbed to the pressure of circumstances, and is once more a thriving Township cross-roads! Sic transit gloria mundi, or in the words of the poet Norris:

"How fading are the joys we dote upon!
Like apparitions seen and gone;
But those which soonest take their flight
Are the most exquisite and strong;
Like angel's visits, short and bright,
Mortality's too weak to bear them long."

To-Night.

The famous Beethoven Quartette give one of their celebrated concerts in the Town Hall, Flesherton, this Thursday evening, under the auspices of the Orange Lodge here. Mr. Chas. Kelly, one of the members of the Quartette, sang in this town once before, and is generally acknowledged as being the best basso in Canada. Mr. Sims Richards, the leading tenor of Toronto, also occupies a very prominent position in musical circles. The lady members are spoken of in most favorable terms. Then there is Mr. Jim Fax, who is said to be the "Funniest man in Canada," and, from what we are told by those who have heard him, this high eulogy is well merited. Altogether a powerful company, affording the people of Flesherton and neighborhood the chance of a lifetime. Don't fail to hear them. Popular price of admission.

Take Ayer's Sasaparilla, in the spring of the year, to purify the blood, invigorate the system, excite the liver to action, and restore healthy tone and vigor to the whole physical mechanism. Remember that quality, not quantity, constitutes the value of medicine.

For The Advance.

At the Window.

Upon the crimson window-drape
He saw her shadow fall,
And had a hundred fallen there,
And hers among them all.
He could have told—so well he knew
That form and queenly grace—
He could have told her figure there,
Though seeing not the face.

'Twas just the dusky twilight hour
And none were passing by;
He stood irresolute, then towards
The window drew he nigh.
"Could I but catch a glimpse," he said,
"Of Lady Clare's face,
I'd rest content, and turn at once
My homeward way to trace."

Does not some unseen influence move
Her head towards the pane?
She stands with puzzled aspect there,
Then turns away again.
Close to the glass his face he pressed,
A passing glimpse to win;
She raised the curtain to look out,
And caught him—looking in!

Eugenia.

From our own Correspondent.

The Rev. J. S. Corcoran preached a very excellent sermon Sabbath evening from I Thes. 4c.3v. "For this is the will of God even your sanctification." The rev. gentleman preaches from the same text next Sabbath evening.

The revival services conducted by the Rev. J. S. Corcoran in the schoolhouse on the 8th have been very successful. Several have professed to have found peace believing.

Rev. Mr. Wilson, of Markdale, paid our town a visit the other day.

Mrs. Bowerman is still very ill and unable to return to her home.

We are glad to learn that Mrs. Corcoran has quite recovered from her late illness.

Owing to Friday's storm we were unable to get the mail from the south. The mail-carrier got out as far as Mr. H. Cairns' but the roads were so much blocked he had to return.

Mr. F. T. Carr has undertake the job of sawing at Stinson's mill, Proton Station.

Mr. H. Meldrum's house had a narrow escape from being destroyed by fire on Saturday. The fire was fortunately discovered and extinguished before any serious damage was done.

The Orangemen of Eugenia contemplate having a grand time in connection with their Soiree to be held here on the 16th. They have engaged some of the best speakers in the County for the occasion. [See notice on "Tit-Bits" page.—ED.]

Owen Sound.

From our own Correspondent.

Feb. 26.—A gloom is cast over our town by the rather sudden death of Mrs. Foote, wife of Capt. J. Foote of the Athabasca, and sister to Dr. J. Brown, of O. S.

Your cor. was present at the last meeting of the O. S. C. I. Lit. Soc. Mr. L. H. Alexander, teacher, rendered the famous "Marseillaise Hymn" accompanied on the piano by Miss Lizzie Richardson of Flesherton. A debate followed: "Resolved that the beauties of art exceed the beauty of nature." This was argued in a most laughable manner, the young gentleman on the negative undergoing all the changes of the color of the rainbow during his outburst on the eloquence of nature. Decision was granted in favor of the affirmative, and now the negative thinks it don't pay to puff and blow for nothing.

Mar. 1.—Came in like a roaring lion. More tail ends of the Dakota Blizzard.

Mar. 2.—The O. S. C. I. Conversazione held this evening, was a brilliant success. Most of those who took part in this would be comparatively strangers to the Fleshertonians; but as two young ladies have left your village to attend the O. S. C. I., news of them will doubtless be interesting: Miss Lizzie and Annie Richardson took part in the opening Glee, "Those Evening Bells," in which some fifty voices joined. In this piece Miss Lizzie Richardson and Alice Tucker held an obligato. The glee was heartily encored. Miss Lizzie took part in the quartette "The whip-poor-will song," being vociferously encored; she also held an obligato in the Glee, "Waves of the Ocean." In the Science Hall below, were shown scenes from the "Ancient Mariner," by a powerful lime-light. These views were very grotesque and interesting. The recitations, solos, duetts, tableaux, etc. were all well rendered, and a large audience dispersed, feeling that an enjoyable evening had been spent.

Mar. 4.—This evening Rev. T. M. Campbell Meth. preached a stirring sermon on "what shall I do to be saved?" As this was the beginning of revival services, the subject was very appropriate, and appreciated by a large congregation.

THE DRESSES WORN.

Royal Robes and Upper Ten Costumes of Novel Build.

In the British Metropolis.

A cablegram from London, dated Saturday night, says: The Queen's drawing room yesterday afternoon took place with shocking bad weather accompaniment. The mercury had fallen to 18 degrees, the air was thick with frozen mist, which stung the face and blinded the eyes, and the wind blew its preface to a gale, due at midnight. Fancy, then, several hundred ladies in regulation Lord Chamberlain summer costume and gentlemen in court dress shivering through their wraps, some for hours, on bleak Constitution Hill, or wide St. James' Park! Awaiting their turns, how everybody envied Lady Randolph Churchill's Russian cloak of slate colored velvet and white fur, fresh from the dominions of the Czar. Never before in the memory of the eldest dowager has a blizzard crossed the Atlantic, and consequently the attendance was miserably small. The Queen wore a black velvet train and bodice, brocaded with silk and trimmed with jet, over a black silk skirt draped with tulle and trimmed with jet; a white tulle veil surmounted by a coronet of diamonds; necklace and earrings of large diamonds, and the Kohinoor as a brooch, with nine orders.

The Princess of Wales wore a train of a shade of mignonette and gold brocade, lined with gold satin; overdress of a darker shade of Lyons velvet and brocade, with volante Irish point lace looped with plumes of feathers and bows of gold ribbon; corsage to correspond; head dress, a tiara of diamonds, feathers and steel; ornaments, pearls, emeralds and diamonds.

The Princess Beatrice wore a dress of pale amethyst poult de soie, with bodice, and train of oriental gold brocade, head dress, feathers, veils and diamond tiara, with stars; her jewels were pearls and emeralds.

The Princess Louise of Wales wore a train of a shade of pale rose, colored brocade edged with tulle; jupe of tulle over faille, looped on one side with a large bunch of snow drops and tied with loops of rose colored ribbons; corsage of brocade trimmed to correspond; ornaments, pearls, diamonds and rubies and the commemoration medal.

The Duchess of Albany wore Lyons black velvet and train, lined and trimmed with white satin; white feathers and veil; ornaments, diamonds and pearls.

The Queen remained through all the ceremonies.

In Ottawa.

An Ottawa correspondent telegraphs: The drawing-room held by their Excellencies on Saturday night was unusually magnificent, due no doubt to the general desire to make a final bow to Lord and Lady Lansdowne before their departure. Between three and four hundred persons were present. Shortly before 9 o'clock one long procession of ladies and gentlemen in lively dress began to move slowly up the Senate Chamber between two rows of the military, to the stirring music of the Governor's Foot Guards' Band. Their Excellencies cordially acknowledged each individual presented in turn by Captain Streatfeild. The Marquis was in full court dress, with white silk knee-breeches and hose and Windsor uniform. He was supported on the right by the Premier, arrayed in his K.C.B. regimentals. Lady Lansdowne wore white lace, draped over a pink satin skirt, a court train of garnet satin, bouquets of pink roses and ferns, with necklace of diamonds. Lady Florence Streatfeild, who stood on her left, was strikingly attired in black lace over geranium red silk. Among the most elegant of so many beautiful costumes were those of Lady Macdonald, who was arrayed in ciel blue from head to foot, velvet trained gown, feather headdress, fawn slippers and gloves, wearing also the famous C. P. R. necklace of diamonds and opals; Mrs. Costigan, ruby plush en traine; Lady Tupper and Mrs. Thos. White, black satin; Mrs. Laurier, ivory silk and plush; the Misses White, green tulle, lemon silk and white gros grain, respectively; Mrs. Edward Langevin, heliotrope satin and black lace; Miss Drual, canary tulle with ostrich feathers and buttercups; Mrs. (Col.) Denison, white satin brocade embroidered with seed pearls, honiton lace and ostrich tips; Mrs. Scarth, black satin and diamonds; Miss Taschereau, flame-colored surah; Mrs. Harry Macdonell, white silk and lace; Miss Constance Meredith, white gros grain (debutante); Mrs. Schrieber, black satin; Mrs Molyneaux St. John, Nile green satin over white and gold brocade; Mrs. A. W. Ross, ivory Chinese brocade satin, ivory lace and amber; Mrs. Pope, white silk and ruby plush; Mrs. Kirkpatrick, white satin brocade; Mrs. Schultz, brown velvet over pink silk, and many others impossible to individualise in the kaleidoscopic scene. The military then filed into line and were presented, after which Lord and Lady Lansdowne left the chambers attened by their suite.

Referring to the dresses worn at the opening of Parliament, another correspondent writes: One very noticeable feature in the ladies' costumes was the absence of any very pronounced decollete dressing. Very few ladies, compared with the number of other years, wore low-necked dresses at all, and those who did had them cut most discreetly as a rule.

A Live Baby by Hamper.

A Manchester despatch says: On Saturday evening, Mr. Midgeley, station-master at the Great Northern Station, Batley, received a hamper parcel by train, and on opening it found a baby alive a few weeks old, enwrapped in warm flannels and attired in long clothes, the whole surrounded by a piece of cretonne. Mr. Midgeley informed the police, and the babe was sent to Dewsbury workhouse.

A BROKEN RAIL

Causes an Accident on the C.P.R.—Several Passengers Hurt.

A last (Sunday) night's Winnipeg despatch says: Passengers arriving on the C.P.R. train from the East yesterday report a miraculous escape from death near Sudbury Junction on Thursday. The passenger engine having become disabled, a freight engine was called into use, which did not have proper appliances for the attachment of the air brakes. On rounding a sharp curve the engineer saw a broken rail some three hundred yards ahead. Knowing it would be useless to attempt to stop the train at that distance, he put on a full head of steam and tried to cross the break. The engine, baggage and mail, smoking and second-class cars got over in safety, but the first-class car left the rail, taking with it the dining car and sleeper. They dragged along a few hundred feet on the ties, when the first-class coach left the trucks and tumbled over into the snow, the dining car crashing into the end a second later. The sleeper also tumbled over on its side. There were sixteen passengers in the first-class coach, all of whom were injured, six severely. The dining car waiters were all badly cut with broken glass and emerged from the wreck with bloody faces. The occupants of the sleeper were badly shaken and bruised, two being forced through the windows. Doctors were summoned from Sudbury and attended the wounded passengers. All were able to proceed excepting one man, who was left behind, his injuries being of a severe nature. One doctor accompanied the train as far as this city. Among the passengers bruised and on board are: Jos. Wrigley and E. K. Beeston, prominent Hudson Bay Company officials, of Winnipeg; Mr. Simpson, Montreal, and a number of people from Ontario. The train which should have arrived from the East to-day is reported twenty-four hours late. The cause of the delay is not known.

THE HOGANS AND THE HOFFMANS

Go on the Warpath Over the Betrayal of Hattie Hogan by Thomas Hoffman.

A Columbia, S. C., despatch says: There is great excitement at Blythewood on account of a quarrel between the families of Hogan and Hoffman. The origin of the trouble was the betrayal of Hattie Hogan by Thomas Hoffman. Miss Hogan's father, at the point of a pistol, made Hoffman promise to marry the girl, but on the day of the wedding the young man was missing. Hogan searched for his daughter's betrayer for two weeks, and then returned to Blythewood to hold the other Hoffmans responsible, one of them being the Mayor of the town. Yesterday Hogan held a pistol to Mayor Hoffman's head and horse-whipped him. He then went to a mill, where another brother, Jack Hoffman, was found, and while a friend of Hogan's covered Hoffman with a Winchester rifle, the enraged father wore out a whip on him. Then the Hoffman family surrounded Hogan's house. The citizens telegraphed to Winnsboro for aid, and a sheriff and posse was sent to Blythewood. Meantime the Judge at Winnsboro telegraphed Mayor Hoffman, not knowing that he was engaged in the riot, to preserve the peace at all hazards. The sheriff arrived in time to arrest the Mayor before there was bloodshed

Canadian Divorce Cases.

An Ottawa despatch says: The following is the full list of the divorce cases which will come before the Senate this session: Andrew Maxwell Irving, from his wife, M. L. Irving, on the grounds of adultery; Catharine Morrison, from her husband, John F. Morrison, on the grounds of adultery, bigamy and desertion; Wm. Henry Middleton, from his wife, Mary Froude, on the ground of adultery and desertion; Mary Froude Middleton, a counter petition, on the ground of cruelty, adultery and desertion; Bennett Rosamond, from his wife, Adair Rosamond, on the ground of adultery and desertion; Eleanor C. Tudor, from her husband, F. L. Hart, on the ground of cruelty and adultery; Mary M. White, from her husband, David C. White, on the ground of incapability of the consummation of the marital relation.

A Commercial Traveller Sent to the Penitentiary.

A Kingston telegram says: George Austin, a traveller, convicted yesterday of embezzlement, was to-day sentenced by the police magistrate to two years in the penitentiary. In a letter to the press he declared that he is innocent of using the money of the firm for his own purposes, and says it was expended for his employers. "I may," he says, "have been guilty of great imprudence, but not of actual theft. Yesterday I knelt at my poor wife's feet, looked her straight in the eyes and swore to my innocence before God, and I now do the same before my fellow-citizens." Austin adds that his family is penniless. The public sympathy has been aroused, and a petition will be sent to the Government for his pardon.

The Law of Compensation.

"Well, well," remarked Mrs. Brown, "I've noticed this about men. When we are girls they don't go away until after midnight, and when we are wives they don't come in until after midnight. I suppose it is the law of compensation, and I don't complain."

Rev. John Hall is said to have pocketed since last September fully $20,000 in marriage fees. One bridegroom gave him a cheque for $5,000 for tying the nuptial knot. Dr. Hall is worth $1,000,000; his total income is at least $100,000. His congregation is the wealthiest in New York city. The amount of $400,000,000 may be seen in his church any Sunday morning. Dr. Hall has a monopoly of all the swell weddings. Brides who desire to be in the fashion insist upon being married by the millionaire clergyman.

THE DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

OTTAWA, Feb. 28. — Parliament was opened in a snow storm this afternoon for the last time by Lord Lansdowne.

Speech from the Throne:

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It affords me much gratification to meet you once more at the commencement of the Parliamentary session and to congratulate you upon the general prosperity of the country. Although the labors of the husbandmen have not been rewarded in some portions of the Dominion by an adequate return the harvest of last year has, on the whole, been plenteous, while in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories it was one of remarkable abundance.

The negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States for the adjustment of what is known as "The Fishery Question," have, I am pleased to inform you, resulted in a treaty which will, I venture to hope, be considered by you as honorable and satisfactory to both nations. The treaty, with the papers and correspondence relating thereto, will be laid before you, and you will be invited to adopt a measure to give effect to its provisions.

The extension and development of our system of railways have not only rendered necessary additional safeguards for life and property, but have given greater frequency to questions in which the interests of rival companies are found to be in conflict and to require authoritative adjustment. As further legislation appears to be needed for these purposes, a measure will be submitted to you for the consolidation and improvement of the Railway Act.

Experience having shown that amendments are required to make the provisions of the Act respecting elections of the members of the House of Commons more effective and more convenient in their operation, you will be asked to consider a measure for the amendment of that statute.

The Act respecting controvertal elections may likewise require attention, with a view to the revisal of certain questions of interpretation which have arisen and which should be set at rest.

My Government has availed itself of the opportunity afforded by the recess to consider the numerous suggestions which have been made for improving the details of the Act respecting the Elective Franchise, and a measure will be submitted to you for the purpose of simplifying the law and greatly lessening the cost of its operation.

The growth of the Northwest Territories renders expedient an improvement in the system of government and legislation affecting those portions of the Dominion, and a Bill for that purpose will be laid before you.

A Bill will be submitted to you to make a large portion of the modern laws of England applicable to the Province of Manitoba and to the Northwest Territories, in regard to matters which are within the control of the Parliament of Canada, but which have not as yet been made the subject of Canadian legislation.

Among other measures, Bills will be presented to you relating to the judiciary, to the Civil Service Act and to the audit of the Public Accounts.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the past year will be laid before you, as well as the estimates for the ensuing year. They have been prepared with all due regard to economy and the requirements of the public service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I commend these important subjects, and all matters affecting the public interests which may be brought before you, to your best consideration, and I feel assured that you will address yourselves to them with earnestness and assiduity.

The Speaker took the chair at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Montague, on rising to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, was received with cheers. He commenced by referring to the early termination of our relations with Lord Lansdowne, who had so satisfactorily discharged the duties of Governor-General. With regard to the Speech from the Throne, the House was rather to be complimented on the fact that it was open to the charge of being brief and meagre of detail, because it was an evidence that the affairs of the country were so well ordered that they need little interference from Parliament. During a recent visit to the Canadian Northwest he was impressed by the fact that what was needed most was population, and though we had not in the past secured such a large share of the immigration to this continent as we would have desired, he believed the indications were now more hopeful. Without venturing to discuss the reasons why we had not been able to secure our share of Old World immigration it was well known that the Americans had made very strenuous efforts by liberal advertising to divert immigration from us to the Northwestern States. The treaty was unsatisfactory to some of our people, as might be expected. Former treaties had been attacked in the same way, and it was good evidence, however, that Canadian rights were pretty well guarded by the treaty that the Gloucester fishermen were dissatisfied with it, and were holding indignation meetings to denounce it. He expected that, following in the wake of the amicable settlement of this difficulty, there would be a greatly enlarged trade with the people of the United States. He thought Canada could fairly be congratulated on the large degree of prosperity existing throughout the country. Our monetary institutions are on a sound basis, our manufactories are in active operation, and there was a very noticeable absence of destitution and want amongst our working classes. He congratulated the country upon the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the opening up of a large trade with China and Japan. Efforts had been made to prove that the farming interest of the country was not in a prosperous condition. He found, on comparison, that, while only 9 per cent. of the value of farm property in Ontario was under mortgage, the figure for ten of the Western States showed that there was an average of 25 per cent. encumbered by mortgage.

Mr. Joncas, speaking in French, seconded the motion. After referring to the several matters touched upon by the Speech, he announced that, as the representative of a constituency (Gaspe) deeply interested in the fishery question, he was quite satisfied with the recent treaty, and felt that the interests of the country had been properly protected.

Mr. Laurier, in replying, expressed regret that the seat of the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was vacant. Last session an Act was passed to create a Department of Trade and Commerce, but he vainly looked over the Treasury benches to find that Minister. He could only believe that the move was reserved for some future occasion, when patronage would be needed or that the whole matter had been pigeon-holed and forgotten. It was also proposed last year to do away with the Ministers of Inland Revenue and Customs, but up to the present time neither of those gentlemen had had his head cut off. The appointment of a Solicitor-General was provided for last session, but there is no Solicitor General. The Election law is unsatisfactory at present. He hoped the amendment would be made so that the Government would not have it in their power to select the deputy returning officers. There must also be some changes in the Controverted Election Act. When we find judges in Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick all differing with reference to the construction to be put upon the Act, it is time Parliament should step in and settle it. The Franchise Act has had a chequered career. It had been amended and suspended and he hoped it would be repealed altogether in 1889. The more this question is discussed, the more apparent it will be that the course the Opposition took was the true course. The determination of the franchise should be left to the Provinces, as it is a complex question and must depend upon the habits and customs of the people in the various sections of the Dominion. If Canada was prospering financially, why could we not hold even our native population? He believed the reason was to be found in the vicious economic system that we had been following for some years. By its fruits a tree should be known, and fruits of our present system of government were the creation of rings and combinations, secure by law from foreign competition, holding by statute the people in their grasp and wringing out of them an undue, unfair and illegitimate gain. The building of the Canadian Pacific Railway across the continent was undertaken on the assurance from the Government that following such rapid construction there would be such an influx of taxpaying population as to provide entirely for the additional cost of the road without drawing on the older section of the Dominion. In 1880 the Premier prophesied a yearly immigration into the Canadian Northwest of twenty-five thousand for the following ten years, bringing a revenue to the Goverument from the sales of lands of $60,000,000. The census returns had dispelled the estimate as to the population, while the income from the sales of lands from 1880 to 1886 amounted to little over four millions, all of which was consumed in surveys and collection. The result was that the construction of the road had largely increased the taxation of the people. The Speech called attention to the good crop in Manitoba. It is true that Manitoba has been blessed by the abundant crop, but the blessing of God has been destroyed by the hand of man. The position of Manitoba to-day, with its plentiful crops, is no better than it was when the crops were scanty. The evils of monopoly are being felt by the people. Manitoba has been complaining for years, and never was the cause more apparent than to-day. Not only is the monopoly exacting high rates, but is letting rot that which it cannot carry itself. The principle on which the Government have been subsidizing railways is that they are necessary for the development of the country; but at the same time they are doing all they can to prevent Manitoba from extending its railway system. Instances are not wanting in history where tyrannical Governments have taken from the people the earnings of their labors; but it has been left for the Government of Canada to stifle the industry of the country. The time has come for a change in the policy of the last ten years. He did not intend to move an amendment to the Address, but at the proper time would present to the House such resolutions as would meet the views of the Opposition

The resolution passed and was referred to a committee, who reported a draft of an address in answer to the Speech which was ordered to be engrossed and sent to His Excellency.

Mrs. Hicks Lord's Fourteen Necklaces.

The social season since the meeting of Congress has not this year been remarkable for its gayety. The fact is that there are a good many people in Washington, and they have not got accustomed to each other. Of course, we have our sensations now and then, and New York furnished us the last one in the person of Mrs. Hicks Lord. Mrs. Dahlgren, the widow of the dead admiral, gave one of her usual big parties to mark the coming of the penitential season, and Mrs. Hicks Lord was there. All Washington has been talking about her ever since. She wore seven pearl necklaces and seven diamond ones, all at the same time, besides having the lace front of her gown caught in various places by handsome solitaires, and diamonds blazing in her lace fan. This takes the rag off the bush so far in Washington, and the women who did not wear so many gems at the Dahlgren party, or did not have them to wear, are making a good deal of loud talk about Mrs. Hicks Lord's fourteen necklaces. — New York Graphic.

Too Curious.

When Mr. Wm. Smith, a son of Rev. Dr. Smith, of Knox Church, Galt, resigned his situation with the Bank of Nova Scotia, in Halifax, the officials gave him an address and a gold watch, and the directors presented a cheque for $400.

The late Dr. Stewart, of Belleville, who was estimated to be worth about $80,000 bequeathed one-half of his estate to his daughter, Mrs. John Bell, wife of the G. T. R. Solicitor, and the balance was equally divided between his three grandchildren.

ONTARIO LEGISL...

The Attorney-General moved ... reading of the Bill "respecti... partment of Agriculture and o... tries." This measure, he said, ... peculiar interest to the farming ... the community. By this Bill it ... posed to place in the hands of a ... specially and exclusively all subj... ing to agriculture and such matte... associated with agriculture—all ... for instance, organized under ... respecting agriculture and arts, t... ers' Institutes, the Agricultural C... Experimental Farm, etc. It was ... that the Minister which it was pr... appoint should have charge also ... Bureau of Industries and the Imm... Office, as being closely connected ... other matters that would receive hi... tion. The speech of His Honor the ... tenant-Governor contained an intir... of the proposition contained in the Bi... he ventured to say that the intimatio... been received everywhere in the Provin... with the greatest satisfaction. The advan... tages of having an Agriculture Minister f... the Province were fully recognized all ... the Province by both political parties. T... would not be wondered at when it was ... membered how large a proportion of ... people of the Province were engaged ... agricultural and kindred pursuits, and t... according to the last census the ru... population was numbered at three tim... the number of the urban population of t... Province. Another very interesting fact i... connection with the same subject was tha... of the exports of the Province more than ... one-half were the produce of farms, and o... the other half the greater part were the ... produce of forests and mines.

Mr. Meredith said he could not congratu... late the Hon. Attorney-General upon bein... over-modest while he was sounding ... highly the praises of himself and colleague... and he could understand why the hand... some face of the Commissioner of Public ... Works was covered with a blush when ... allusion was made to his being overworked. He claimed that it was unfair to compare the work of the Province at the present time to that which fell to the lot of the men who came into power immediately after Confederation, and who had to organize and get into operation many things which subsequent Ministers found awaiting them. The Hon. Attorney-General talked of overwerk on the part of himself and colleagues, but of course the mass of work done in all the departments fell to the lot of the permanent officials and not to the heads of departments. He would not question or deny a word of what the hon. the Attorney-General had said with regard to the importance of the agricultural industry or as to the propriety of a Minister being allowed to devote the whole of his time to it. He would only enter his protest against the proposed increase of public expenditure by the cost of an additional Minister and his accompanying staff. He thought that if there was one thing more than another calculated to bring trouble upon the people of this country it was that they were being over-governed. They had their House of Commons and their Dominion Senate, and their Legislature in every Province, and the expense of keeping up all these was enormous. Yet the Government was preparing to increase this cost by the addition of another Minister. Let them profit by the example of Quebec, a Province which hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House were fond of calling reckless and extravagant. Quebec was reducing its Ministers, while Ontario proposed increasing her's.

The Bill then passed.

Hon. Mr. Hardy moved the second reading of the Bill affecting industrial farms and houses of industry.—Carried.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:

To amend the Voters' List Act; also to amend the Act relating to innkeepers—Mr. Gibson (Hamilton).

Mr. Monk moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the general Road Companies Act. He considered that when a road needed repairs a delay of six days was unnecessary, and the Bill proposed to do away with the necessity for six days' notice.

The Bill was read the second time and referred to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Garson moved the second reading of a Bill to amend the Municipal Act by facilitating the conveyance of burying-grounds from cemetery companies to municipalities. The Bill was read a second time and referred to the Municipal Committee.

Sale of Burns' Relics.

A table, four chairs, a ladle and a pair of tongs, which were part of Burns' parlor furniture at Ellisland, together with a letter, a leaf of his excise book and a steel chopper, were recently sold at Dumfries amongst the effects of the late Mr. W. Nicholson, joiner, whose mother was in the service of Mrs. Burns, and received the table, chairs, tongs and ladle at the time of her marriage. There was a large attendance, but the competition was slack. The following prices were obtained: Two chairs, £12 10s., to Mr. McKissock, Plough Inn, Ayr; one do., £9 15s., to Mr. J. J. Glover, painter, Dumfries; one do., £8, to Mrs. Smith, Globe Inn, Dumfries; ladle, £3 5s., to Mr. McKissock; tongs, £1 12s., to Mr. Andrew Lawson, Dumfries; letter, £3 5s., to Mr. James Richardson, Glasgow; leaf from excise book, £4 5s., to Mr. Richardson; chopper, £1, to Mr. Richardson. A bread-basket for which £1 6s. was offered was withdrawn. The letter is to the poet's wife, who was then at Mauchline, and is dated from Ellisland, 12th September, 1788. It is usually given in the poet's works, and refers among other things to new gowns which Jean was getting, and the baiveridge of which he hoped to have.

The dervishes who have recently defeated a part of the Abyssinian army and given King John something to think of besides the Italians, are our old friends the Soudanese rebels. While the Italians are making trouble for the King in the north-east corner of his country, the followers of the late Mahdi are again assailing the western border of his highlands. The strange part of this affair is that King John invited the recent attacks of the Soudanese by his expedition to relieve Kassala, which he undertook at the solicitation of England when that country was in hot water in the Soudan.

LOVE'S REWARD;

Or, the Rival's Plot.

They made a pretty couple as they stood in the shadow of the vine-covered cottage in that quaint old German town. A fair-haired girl with flaxen hair and violet eyes and the sun-browned youth, in picturesque garb, at her side. The girl was saying, as she smiled through her tears: "I wish I were a man, Conrad. I would go with you to the wars. What will your poor mother do in your absence?"

"I shall expect you, Zina, to comfort her in my absence," he said, sadly. "See these gold pieces," opening his purse. "I shall leave her with enough money for some time to come."

As the time for parting drew near and they had exchanged a last embrace, Zina said firmly:

"Whatever happens to you I will be true. If God wills it that you fall in battle I shall live faithful to your memory as if I were your widow."

So they parted with heavy hearts, he to the wars and she to the dull routine of her daily life.

Zina was also beloved by another village youth, Heinrich Altman, and the news that Conrad had gone to the wars filled him with new hope. He was the telegraph operator in town and through his hands passed all the telegrams from the seat of war for the morning paper. He brought Zina all the news.

One day he brought her the copy of a despatch describing how Conrad had acted in a cowardly manner during an engagement. Zina refused to believe a word of it and told Heinrich to leave the house at once.

As time passed and no news came from Conrad, it was rumored about town that he was disgraced, and Zina's mother now worried her daughter early and late to marry Altman, who had come into money.

At last, nearly crazed by the constant strain upon her mind, Zina made a sudden resolve. She would leave home secretly and go and offer herself as a nurse for the wounded soldiers, and thus by relieving the sufferings of others mitigate her own anguish.

Had Conrad's mother been living, Zina would not have had the heart to go, for the lonely old woman had been dependent upon her for many kindly services. But about a week after Conrad's departure she was found one morning apparently in a deep sleep, so peaceful and quiet that at first Zina hesitated to disturb her, but it was the slumber that knows no waking.

Great consternation prevailed in the household when Zina was found to be missing. As often happens, when it was too late to change their course of action Zina's parents regretted their harshness.

Heinrich, too, felt the pangs of sorrow and of unavailing remorse as he saw how useless his plotting had proved, and that it had brought misery to the girl he loved. He found that a true heart will be still true, though the object of affection be faulty; that to hate the sin is not necessarily to hate the sinner.

As Zina started out alone and unprotected on her tedious pilgrimage, oftentimes her heart throbbed with fear as she met and passed groups of rough-looking men. But her chosen garb of a Sister of Charity proved a most effectual safe guard. The most rude and reckless respected its sanctity and made no attempt to gaze at the face sheltered in its sombre hood.

When about three days' journey from home she came upon a temporary hospital which had been fitted up for the accommodation of wounded soldiers. Here she proffered her services, which were gladly accepted. She was taken at once into the ranks of nurses, for the supply was far short of the demand. For days she worked faithfully among the poor fellows of one ward, binding up their wounds and lending a sympathizing ear to their messages for distant friends.

Then she was changed to a different ward. As she entered it and glanced pityingly around, what was her surprise to see Conrad's face lying pale and disfigured upon one of the snowy pillows.

She gave an involuntary cry and started forward. Mingled with her sorrow at sight of a ghastly wound which stretched across one cheek and extended to the temple was a surging tide of joy at the thought that here was evidence to prove that her confidence had not been misplaced. No coward could carry a mark like that. He had received it face to face with his foe. And, conspicuous from its bright-colored ribbon, a decoration lay upon his breast. Zina recognized it to be like the one worn by an aged veteran at home, who had won it by bravery which had caused him to be ever after incapacitated from active duty, but which had made him the one person in the place sought out by visitors of notability. Often had her tiny fingers touched the old man's precious badge reverently and admiringly, and Conrad wore one.

With the speed of light these thoughts and conclusions flashed through her mind as she stood beside his bed. Suddenly his eyes opened and turned toward her.

"Oh, Conrad!" she murmured, sinking upon her knees beside him, "I am here! Do you not know your own Zina?" for a wild fear had darted into her mind as she met his indifferent, unmeaning stare. Had he been bereft of reason by that terrible wound? But, no; he knew the voice and put forth a hand to grope aimlessly about until it closed upon Zina's slender fingers. Then he said:

"Thank God that you have come to me—that I can hear you speak once more before I die!"

"Don't talk of dying. I cannot bear it. I have come to take such care of you that you will live," sobbed Zina.

"I do not wish to live. Do you see that I am blind? It is better for me to die than to drag out a wretched, burdensome existence."

The girl bent and covered his hand with passionate kisses.

"Blind or not, it matters little to me, so that you are alive. If you could only know how I have longed to see you."

From the day that Zina found him Conrad began to grow better, and in a few weeks was able to be moved. To the joy of all his friends he returned home entirely cured, even of his blindness. There was a great wedding in the church, but Altman was not there—nor did the happy couple miss him.

NO GHOST AT GLAMMIS.

A Visit to the Castle Where Macbeth Slew Duncan in His Sleep.

Whether Macbeth killed Duncan, his cousin, at Inverness or at Botgoswane, or at his paternal castle of Glammis, this last will ever the readiest appeal to the imagination as the fit scene of the crime. Chroniclers and antiquaries may therefore say what they please; the romancer will ever associate Glammis with the ghastly story. "The owl that shrieked" was in the ivy of the Glammis watch tower. Lady Macbeth, with trembling assurance, stood on familiar flooring when she whispered to herself: "He is about it." Nearly 900 years have passed since Macbeth was king, and Glammis Castle still stands. It is not quite the gloomy beetle-browed sort of pile one would wish it to be, but it is suggestive enough for minds in touch with the metaphysical. You walk for a mile from the little railway station of Glammis (about twenty miles east of Perth), of which the very material advertisement of patent sheep dip upon its walls stays oddly in the memory; you follow a high road like any other high road, with a landscape of fir copses and blue hill to the right and the Glammis woods of ash, oak, beech and walnut bounding the road on the other side, and at the end of the mile the wood breaks to embosom the castle lodge and the castle gate. Here the person of sentiment may get a pleasurable shock. The Glammis entrance is as forbidding as it ought to be. Imagine a low, machicolated building, somberly mossed and weather-stained, rising in the middle to a dark portal of stern, undecorated stone, with, for a garnish upon either side, the figure of a naked man, life size, standing before a stone lion, with an arm outstretched toward the distant hills of Dunsinane. From the fashion of their hair the men may be ancient Gaels. But, whatever they are, Glammis lodge keeper's wife dislikes them. "Such naked loons!" remarked the old lady with a curl of the lip at them. Nor had she any more respect for the Glammis ghost when I inquired about it. "I dinna believe in them," she said. Macbeth and Duncan she dismissed peremptorily as idle tales, excrescences that got foisted upon the castle history, like the lichen upon its stones. Her theory of the origin of such legends was simple. In olden times men were both stronger and wickeder than now; they did deeds we would shrink at and thought nothing about them. Glammis was not a whit more deserving of a ghost than any other old house in the Highlands. Such treason as this was only to be met by an abrupt walk away into the woods toward the castle itself. There is no show road to Glammis. One winds up and down in the copses, frightening a fawn or a hare from the middle of the path, and with the song of linnets and thrushes, in the overarching trees. Lord Strathmore, when he is here, lives in oblivion, untroubled by the tramp of inquisitive tourists. The wood suddenly falls and then ends, a trout brook is crossed by a bridge, and Glammis castle is before us on a glade of velvety turf, and the fir-clad hillocks beyond it. And now the earlier allusion may well revive. The castle is old, though not in its superstructure so very old. Doubtless, however, Macbeth's foundations are still Lord Strathmore's foundations. And the two truncated guardhouses which rise a few feet from the lawn, with the ruins tenderly ivied, take us back at a plunge some seven or eight centuries. Modern Glammis is of the Gothic so common in French chateaux. A multitude of "extinguisher turrets" soar at different elevations from its blue slate roofing and at its loftiest part it is crowned by a dainty cupola, like a rustic temple of Diana, with a chiseled balcony of much taste and beauty. The pink stone of the building is jewelled with stone escutcheons, inscriptions and dates. One tower is of 1606; a florid window is marked 1646, and a later water 1699. Here one reads how "Patrick, Lord Glammis, and D. Anna," his wife, made alterations in such a year, and how their successor added to them. One wonders what Macbeth and his wife were to these good people.—Pall Mall Gazette.

How to Save Doctors' Bills.

Never go to bed with cold or damp feet.

Never lean with the back upon anything that is cold.

Never begin a journey until the breakfast has been eaten.

Never take warm drinks and then immediately go out into the cold.

After exercise of any kind never ride in an open carriage or near the window of a car for a moment; it is dangerous to health or even life.

Never omit regular bathing, for, unless the skin is in regular condition, the cold will close the pores and favor congestion or other diseases.

When hoarse, speak as little as possible until the hoarseness is recovered from, else the voice may be permanently lost, or difficulties of the throat be produced.

Merely warm the back by the fire, and never continue keeping the back exposed to the heat after it has become comfortably warm. To do otherwise is debilitating.

Never stand still in cold weather, especially after having taken a slight degree of exercise, and always avoid standing on ice or snow, where the person is exposed to the cold wind.

When going from a warm atmosphere into a cooler one keep the mouth almost closed, so that the air may be warmed by its passage through the nose ere it reaches the lungs.

Keep the back, especially between the shoulder blades, well covered; also the chest well protected. In sleeping in a cold room establish the habit of breathing through the nose, and never with the open mouth.—American Analyst.

No Ear but a Warm Heart.

A bit of musical anecdote was told me the other day. On the first appearance of a famous pianist in Boston, Mr. A. found himself seated in front of his neighbor, Mr. B., whom he had always supposed entirely devoid of musical taste, but who proved especially demonstrative in his applause. In the intermission Mr. A. turned to his seat and observed to the other: "I am glad you are enjoying the concert so much. I didn't know you cared for music to such a degree." "Oh, I don't," Mr. B. responded with great frankness; "it's all Greek to me, but I think one ought to welcome a stranger."—Boston Letter to the Providence Journal.

A DAUGHTER SUES FOR $25,000

Extraordinary Action for Libel Against a Slanderous Papa.

Yesterday, before Judge Bayley and a jury, the case of "Stokes vs. Stokes" came on for hearing. It was an action brought by Miss Laura Stokes to recover from her father the sum of £5,000 as damages for libel and slander. It appeared that the plaintiff lived with her father and mother both in London and Brighton. The libel consisted in the defendant writing letters and stating that his daughter stole his money and pawned his goods to the amount of from £30 to £40 per week. The plaintiff denied that she had ever stolen her father's money or pawned his goods. She had greatly suffered through her father's statements. Mrs. Stokes, the mother of the plaintiff, stated that she was security for her daughter's costs in this action. Her husband's statements about the plaintiff had become a by-word in Brighton. The defendant had made those statements before the workpeople in Coventry street. The trouble between her and the defendant arose through witness seeing him with a woman at the Inventions Exhibition. The defendant was a very wealthy man. He was now living with another woman. She had no vindictive feeling against the defendant. The slander which he had uttered about the plaintiff was known at Brighton as well as in London.

The defendant, Mr. Stokes, was called, and gave a complete denial to the charge of libel. He deposed that he had received considerable provocation from Mrs. Stokes and the plaintiff as from his other children. He was being continually robbed. He charged his children with the robberies, but only in a fit of anger. His wife had left him, taking the furniture with her, and he was served with two writs. He settled it by making her an allowance of £6 per week and £500 down. Then he was assailed by his son, who asked him for £25 down. He paid him £125. He was asked to send a letter of apology, which he did, and, notwithstanding this, he was served with a writ. The letter of apology was read in court by Mr. Kemp, Q.C., who, with Mr. Ross-Innes, was counsel for the defendant, and stated that the defendant had no recollection of saying that Laura (the plaintiff) had robbed him, but if he had he would fully apologize. The letter further stated: "God knows that I have worked hard enough, and it is very hard that Laura, my favorite child, should turn against me." The action was not brought for damages, but merely from the vindictive motives of Mrs. Stokes. The latter had not always been his wife, her real name formerly being Laura Reynolds. He had lived with her for thirty years. His children and Mrs. Stokes had insulted him and annoyed him for years, and if he had said anything against the plaintiff it was only in anger. Witnesses from the household of the defendant deposed that they had heard the defendant call the plaintiff a robber, but they considered they were only angry words. Mr. Kemp, Q.C., argued that if a verdict were given for the plaintiff it should be with damages of the smallest coin of the realm. The learned counsel said that the defendant's wife was keeping up the action merely for revenge, she having quarrelled with the defendant. Mr. Kemp characterized her as a cruel, wicked and vindictive woman. In the result the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; damages, £250.—London Daily News.

CAPTURING A SCHOOLMA'AM.

The Difficulties the Young Man Experienced in Phrasing His Proposal in a Proper Way.

"Yes," said the young man as he threw himself at the feet of the pretty school teacher, "I love you and would go to the world's end for you."

"You could not go to the end of the world for me, James. The world, or the earth, as it is called, is round like a ball, slightly flattened at the poles. One of the first lessons in elementary geography is devoted to the shape of the globe. You must have studied it when you were a boy."

"Of course I did, but——"

"And it is no longer a theory. Circumnavigators have established the fact."

"I know, but what I meant was that I would do anything to please you. Ah! Minerva, if you knew the aching void——"

"There is no such thing as a void, James. Nature abhors a vacuum; but admitting that there could be such a thing, how could the void you speak of be a void if there was an ache in it?"

"I meant to say that my life will be lonely without you; that you are my daily thought and my nightly dream. I would go anywhere to be with you, If you were in Australia or at the north pole I would fly to you. I——"

"Fly! It will be another century before men can fly. Even when the laws of gravitation are successfully overcome there will remain, says a late scientific authority, the difficulty of maintaining a balance——"

"Well, at all events," exclaimed the youth, "I've got a pretty fair balance in the savings bank and I want you to be my wife. There!"

"Well, James, since you put it in that light, I——"

Russia's Great Population.

According to the latest report of the Russian Statistical Committee for 1885 the gross population of the empire was at the close of that year 108,787,235. The total urban population is given at 13,760,000, resident in 1,274 towns. The villages and parishes contain a population of 77,545,271. There are only four cities in the empire containing more than 200,000 inhabitants—St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw and Odessa. Nine towns have a population varying between 100,000 and 200,000, and twenty-three towns between 50,000 and 100,000. The number of scholastic institutions is 41,492, with a male attendance of 1,850,964, and of females 638,070. Of schools of agriculture and forestry there are only sixteen in the whole empire, with an attendance of 2,156 pupils, or, say, one such school to every 5,862 of the population.—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA

Grievous Troubles That Beset the Family Medical Man.

The individual, no matter what his profession may be, who imagines that he is going to give satisfaction to the general public in anything he may undertake is certainly the victim of a delusion. It is impossible to please everybody. The man, be his station in life what it may, who comes up to the expectation of the multitude, has not yet been born. The editor, in particular, soon makes this discovery. The clergyman also knows that there are people in his congregation who are never satisfied with what he does or leaves undone. The doctor is another professional man who has a hard row to hoe. If a doctor dresses well and wears a high hat, people say that he is a medical dude. If, on the other hand, he pays little or no attention to his toilet, then he is accused of lack of dignity. If he goes into society, attends balls and parties, then the impression is that he is fishing for popularity. If he does not he is accused of putting on airs.

If the physician visits his patients while they are in good health, he is accused of foisting himself upon them. He comes to the house in order to be invited to dinner. If, on the other hand, he never comes unless he is called, the inference is that the only use he has for his patients is to make money out of them when they are sick. If the doctor attends church, of course he is a hypocrite who is trying to work on the religious feelings of the community. If he does not attend church, nothing can be plainer than that he is an infidel or a socialist. If the doctor's wife does not return the calls that other ladies make on her, then she is stuck up, turning up her nose at her betters, etc. If she does return the calls, then she is flushing patients for her husband to shoot at.

If the doctor's horse is fat, that is a sure sign that he has not got much to do. If the animal is emaciated, he is a brute for not taking better care of his horse. If he drives fast, he is trying to create the false impression that he has been called to the bedside of some important patient. If he drives slowly he does not care a cent whether or not his patients die before he gets to them.

If the patient recovers his health, he is indebted to a kind Providence or a strong constitution, or to the care that was taken of him during his illness. In no case is the doctor entitled to any credit for his recovery. If the patient dies, he was undoubtedly murdered by his physician. If the medical man is sociable and talkative, the people say, "we don't want a doctor who tells everything he knows." If he is a silent man, then they say a doctor should encourage his patients to be communicative.

If he talks politics, they say that a doctor should have no politics; and if he does not talk politics, then he is a sneak and a time server who either has no politics or is afraid to own up what his politics really are. If he does not send in his bill, his object is to prevent the patient from engaging another doctor. If he does send in his bill, he is in a fearful hurry for his money, and so on to the end of the chapter.

A Woman Worth Two Men.

Mrs. Phillips, a white lady, some 30 years old, made last year thirty odd bales of cotton and plenty of corn, peas and potatoes on Capt. G. O. This year she has bought a mule and is all ready to plant.—Savannah News.

A Madman at Large!

He is a well-known citizen, and his nearest and dearest friends do not suspect his insanity. How do we happen to know about it? Listen; his appetite is gone, he is low-spirited, he don't sleep well, he has night sweats, he is annoyed by a hacking cough. These symptoms are the forerunners of consumption and death, and yet he neglects them. Is it any wonder we call him a madman? If you are his friend tell him to get a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery without delay. It will cure him if he takes it in time. It will not miraculously create new lungs when the old ones are nearly gone, but it will restore diseased ones to a healthy condition. Tell him about it, and warn him that in his case delay means death

Use the great specific for "cold in the head" and catarrh—Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy.

While a herd of cattle were being driven through a piece of woodland in Maine three bears were encountered sitting in the roadway as if waiting for them. Without a moment's hesitation the oxen in the herd charged ahead and drove the bears before them until they were lost in the forest. One ox pursued a bear for nearly a mile and tossed the animal with his horns a number of times.

Wonderful Popularity.

The fact that the sale of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets exceed that of any other pill in the market, be it great or small, is on account of the fact that they are tiny, little, sugar-coated granules, and that in most cases one little "Pellet" is sufficient for a dose; that they are purely vegetable and perfectly harmless; and for constipation, biliousness, sick headache, and all diseases arising from derangement of the liver, stomach or bowels, they are absolutely a specific. A gentle laxative or active cathartic, according to size of dose.

A London society journal publishes the following story of "a certain British peer who suffers from kleptomania," and whose name as well as his distressing malady is kept carefully covered up. The other day His Lordship purloined his Countess' false teeth and hid them in his boot. His valet, who empties the boot every night and restores stolen property, thought the teeth belonged to another lady and sent them to her with a politely worded note which he has always used for similar emergencies. It was not till the Countess had inquired for her teeth and the messenger was kicked by the other lady's husband that things were put right.

ITCHING PILES.

Symptoms—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. Swayne's Ointment stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. Swayne's Ointment can be obtanedof druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

"How many lodges did you say your husband belonged to?" she suddenly asked. "Fifteen." "Mercy on me! But think of a man being out fifteen nights a week! I am really glad that I'm a widow!"

is offered by the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for a case of Chronic Nasal Catarrh which they cannot cure.

SYMPTOMS OF CATARRH.—Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak, watery, and inflamed; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a nasal twang; the breath is offensive; smell and taste are impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, or less understood by physicians.

By its mild, soothing, and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures the worst cases of Catarrh, "cold in the head," Coryza, and Catarrhal Headache. Sold by druggists everywhere; 50 cents.

"Untold Agony from Catarrh."

Prof. W. Hausner, the famous mesmerist, of Ithaca, N. Y., writes: "Some ten years ago I suffered untold agony from chronic nasal catarrh. My family physician gave me up as incurable, and said I must die. My case was such a bad one, that every day, towards sunset, my voice would become so hoarse I could barely speak above a whisper. In the morning my coughing and clearing of my throat would almost strangle me. By the use of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, in three months, I was a well man, and the cure has been permanent."

"Constantly Hawking and Spitting."

Thomas J. Rushing, Esq., 2902 Pine Street, St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I was a great sufferer from catarrh for three years. At times I could hardly breathe, and was constantly hawking and spitting, and for the last eight months could not breathe through the nostrils. I thought nothing could be done for me. Luckily, I was advised to try Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, and I am now a well man. I believe it to be the only sure remedy for catarrh now manufactured, and one has only to give it a fair trial to experience astounding results and a permanent cure."

HALTON.

The defeat of the Temperance party in the county of Halton has given rise to a variety of surimses as to the causes that led up to such a change in public sentiment. Some people blame the Franchise Act. Others ascribe it to the recent political contest, which, they assert, had a tendency to create dissensions among the ranks of the supporters of the Act. Another class allege that the business men did it. Everybody seems to have a theory to put forward on such occasions. But whatever the cause, this we know for a certainty, viz., that the Scott Act has been repealed by a majority of nearly two hundred.

Now, instead of disheartening, this should spur Temperance people to greater exertions than ever. The work of teaching humanity the evil and danger of the drinking habit should not be allowed to lag. It is a great work. It is a good work. What matters it if victory does not always perch upon our banners, when we know that we have the smile and benediction of Heaven ever resting upon our labors? Clouds and darkness may be around us, but above is the Sun of Righteousness. The rift in the clouds is getting larger every day, and an era is approaching when that glorious orb will shine forth upon mankind in cloudless majesty!

We are not of those who would impart useful knowledge by means of brute force; or who would call people fools because they do not at once forsake long-established usage and see eye-to-eye with ourselves. No! He who graciously sent the message of "Peace and good-will towards men" will not sanction such methods. Rather let us convince men of error by precept and example. Let us show them that drunkenness is a sure forerunner of ruin and permature death; that the drinker is seldom placed in positions of trust and responsibility by drinking men themselves; that it robs men of reason, leads to crime, and eventually to spiritual death; that, from a purely worldly standpoint, it is unprofitable even to the man who takes their money over the bar! Let all this and much more be done in an earnest and kindly manner. It has been done in the past, and how rapidly the circle of total abstinence has widened and widened until this moment, when its influence for good is felt far and wide over this great country. The power of the drink demon has been tremendously lessened, and his once mighty throne is already tottering.

But then some very good people are afraid the reverse in Halton will sound the death-knell of the Scott Act in Canada. What if it does? Does not a healthy and sound temperance sentiment prevail which can never be extinguished, but which will be fanned into a brighter and more enduring blaze? The wars of the Roses formed a dark and stormy epoch in English history, but from its throes came forth the true British nation to-day a mighty empire upon which, it is said the sun never sets. Who knows but that the Scott Act, and the contests in connection therewith, have simply been the precursors to total prohibition? There have been mighty changes in the past ten years, who knows what the next decade may bring forth? In the meantime let Temperance people be alive to their duties, and let their watchword be "For God, for Home, and Native Land."

CRITICISM.—A lady in Brockville states—I was induced to try Nasal Balm for a long standing cold in my head that was pronounced Catarrh. The Balm gave immediate relief and permanently cured me. It was so pleasant and agreeable to use that I at first thought it "no good." I now use it with my children for colds and stoppage of the nasal passages.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Our wide-wake brother of the Dundalk Herald clipped an item from the Toronto Globe last week, which gave the names of the Markdale deputation that waited upon the Government, re incorporation of that place as a town, and adds:—"We will pay them a visit when they get on their "big pants," vide the Flesherton ADVANCE." But, alas! the "big pants" have been hung up for use some time "away in the distant future"—when the ambitious infant has grown up to man's estate!

The Shelburne Economist and Markdale Standard bewail unpaid advertising contracts by Yankee medicine men. Unless in the case of such firms as J. C. Ayer & Co. and other reputable concerns, our brother newspaper men will find it wise to insist on spot cash payments for all foreign advertising contracts. Again: most of these doubtful outside concerns want their advertising done at starvation prices. Is it right to give them any such undue advantage over local patrons? We trow not. Let our brethren of the rural press insist upon regular rates all around, taboo all doubtful foreign advertisers, and country journalism will have reached an elevation it has never yet generally attained.

According to the sworn census taken by citizens of repute, Markdale has a population of "seven hundred and twenty (720) and not more." The Standard is of opinion that this is incorrect, but the sworn statement of such gentlemen as Lawyer McCullough and Mr. S. J. Coleman ought to count for considerable. This statement, then, actually shows, that the difference in population between Flesherton and Markdale is very little. And yet our citizens are not aching to ask Mr. Mowat to take the incorporation of Flesherton—as town or village—into his "most serious consideration." But some places are ambitious and cannot resist the temptation of being sat upon by "the powers that be." "Thank you, sir, kindly, said the man, whom a certain nobleman had just kicked down stairs, "its an honor to be kicked by a lord!" Comparisons are unnecessary.

Circumstances have considerable to do with making prosperous and progressive towns and villages; but live, wide-awake, pushing, energetic, and enterprising men form by far the most important element. Talk up your town at home and abroad, patronize your own business men, and be united in all things likely to be mutually beneficial. Thats how hamlets grow into villages, villages into towns, and towns into cities. "Never say die," and "set a stout heart to a stae brae."

Now that the Dominion Voters' Lists will be got out in the Government printing office in future, what say those editors who received such a bountiful supply of "pap" a couple of years ago?

In an article under the heading, "Country Newspapers Snubbed," the Thornbury News points out the gross injustice done to the rural press by the Ontario Government, in the matter of permitting city printing office canvassers to "run at large" throughout the country—soliciting orders to the detriment of home industry. True; and the country press will bear it as meekly as the gentle lambkin. When will our brethren learn to sink all political and private differences and unite as one man—the same as every other class—in petitioning parliament to better their condition, and otherwise harmoniously striving to elevate rural newspaperdom above mediocrity?

The extraordinary popularity of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is the natural result of its use by all classes of people for over forty years. It has proven itself the very best specific for colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. FARMERS' INSTITUTE.

A Paper read at the Centre Grey Farmers' Institute by Dr. Christoe.

The farmer's literature is nothing, unless it be practical; their mere study of works how much soever, Agricultural and Scientific, cannot stand in lieu of the plough, the harrow and scythe. And therefore if the former are studies, which necessarily have a place in husbandry—they are to teach the more scientific, economical and potential methods, to attain by easier and more sure methods—a larger increase and better quality from their agricultural domain.

It is not to be questioned that mutual inter-communications, at such institutes as these have no inconsiderable influence and that too of a very practical nature, to consummate, the end of their establishment.

There are, however, some things connected with agriculture, horticulture, physiology and biology—beautiful in their application and interesting in their development, and which give to the student enhanced views of the wonderful chemical and physiological action of nature—principles whose knowledge if unapplied, it is true—makes little difference to the yield of the field or the kine—but to the thoughtful and studious are sources of unbounded delight.

Let us for a little look at the laws of nature. What is law? Let me answer, Law is not power. Law is merely directory and necessary, there must be a power behind law, else law is nothing less than a failure In civil and political economy this is self evident—witness the failure of the Scott Act enforcements, the law is there and fairly good but where is the power? It is equally so in regard to nature; in whatever field of research, if no power existed behind the beautifully established law in the case—nature would be in a state of stasis and consequent degeneracy and want would be the legitimate result. The term protoplasm is the word used to represent the primary principal or pabulum from which all things, animal and vegetable spring, and is said to be composed of oxygen, hydrogen, carbon and nitrogen. It is a remarkable fact that whether it be the beginning of a plant, a tree, an elephant or a man—the most powerful microscope can discover no difference in the protoplasm designed for each. The minute spec enclosed in a shell or sac, looking like the merest atom of fluid or the infinitesimal germ of an animalculae possesses, nothing more nor less than this shapeless protoplasm—the wheat, the barley, the ox or the horse has one common origin; in this mass—as well as the tiniest insect that crawls—but only expose this primary cell or ova, to proper surroundings and influences, viz., heat, light and moisture, and watch them carefully—under a powerful microscope—and that which was a simple shapeless mass of protoplasm, begins to take shape, here a bit is pinched up for a head there a bit for the tail now it is the wing or the leg, until the proper shape is produced—according to the law in each case provided whether it be the development of a man or a whale.

From what has been said it is evident some power exists by which the distinctive species are impressed and developed. It may reasonably be asked, therefore, what is power? This is a question of life of Biogenesis, which to this moment, has never been answered, and whether in some age to come a solution will be had is equally unanswerable other than Paul says: "But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him and to every seed his own body." The great principle of gravitation was discovered by Newton, by the falling of an apple—the laws and effects by which it is governed and utilized are solved and understood but Newton, with all his philosophy, nor any in the generations since have been able to tell what gravitat'n is; so likewise electricity—what is it? can any one say? It will I think be quite clear, viz., the power of germination and the laws which govern it are distinctive in their characters—one of them is the secret, of the Creator, the other is comprehended and comprehensible. There is, however, a principle involved, known to every body and because it is so generally known, affords no special inquiry or interest, namely, their unchanged continuousness. Although meditations suggested by specie their size, shape, beauty, power and fertility—if each were erratic uncertain and doubtful as to their perpetual production and likeness with their fecundity spasmodic and uncertain and worse their primary protoplasm yielding interchangeably—now an apple, then an elephant, every thing uncertainty! What a spectacular panorama of uncertainty and disappointment! one expecting a crop of wheat, but gets potatoes! But barring an occasional freak of nature, the Law of continuity to every specie and thing exists and every time nature is true to herself—like produces like—the seed of an apple produces an apple tree; the egg of a fowl a fowl; the egg of an alligator an alligator. A grain of corn, corn and so on, through every specie and kind. As a further illustration, take the compass. If its magnet were erratic—now north, now here, now there and everywhere—the mariner dare not venture his craft from shore. And how odd, too, would be the effect by the reversal of the laws of gravitation—now so light, flying off to the sun; now so ponderous, that the earth itself would scarcely be sufficient to prevent us being thrust to its centre; or, more likely, the earth and all its contents would be playing antics of an indescribable nature. But this law of continuity ensures us stability and a continuation of the laws of gravitation, the fruits of the field, as well as the beast, the bird, the fish and the flower—exactly according to scriptural pronunciamento, viz., seed time and harvest summer and winter shall continue to the very end of all things.

It should not be forgotten, however, that enemies exist to an alarming extent in every department of the honorable pursuit of husbandry—insidiously but surely the farmer's crops are devastated by manifold foes; isolated and alone, one is struck with the seeming impotence of such diminutive and insignificant creatures; but multiplied into armies, they become potent for mischief—inevitable destruction follows in the wake of their operations. And it matters not whether they be insectivorous or fungus, each feeds and is dependent for existence upon the vital energies of the plant or fruit it invades. They are parasites in the truest sense. Their methodical operations almost lead to a supposition, that they are sentients, having the power of intelligent choice—seeing each one finds its own pabulum and habitat for its expansion and growth. As a sample it may be noticed in the Colorado Beetle's liking for the potato leaf, and so significant is this, that it is often remarked, that the mother beetle sits patiently watching the first shoot of the potato leaf on which to feed and deposit her ova; she agglutinates them to the plant, then leaves them to the tender mercies of rain and sun and Paris Green!

It would be expressing an ad literatum, to say that in some one way or another every plant in its turn barely escapes a parasite, one or more. So that the farmer has another and a wider field for enquiry, not only will he have to sow but he should know the time when the place where and the ground necessary and best to escape those legions of parasitical agencies, if escape is to be had. I have myself listened often to arguments bearing upon such questions, but a common concensus of opinion is rarely arrived at. Abundant reasons exist why such opinions are Chamelion like and very appropriately it may be said regarding them you all are right you all are wrong—the variation of climate, the soil and the seed powerfully influence, the conclusion in every case, and diversity is the result.

It was in listening to one of the Professors of the Agricultural College that I was lead to meditate or theorize if you please upon some points in connection with this subject—but it should be remembered that a theory may be true or false, it never can be received as a fact until it will bear demonstration and proof, Agricultural College Professors have means and opportunities for inquiries and proof, such as few possess, and in their lectures before the institutes they should study to be practical, otherwise little good can accrue from their deliverances. I am sensible that such institutions, if properly operated, will prove a means to facilitate solutions to questions mentioned a little ago. The question discussed by the professor was the Rust or Red Robbin on wheat. His theory—for it was that, and nothing more—was, that it was, a fungus, but very much influenced by surroundings. He said, the Barberry bush influenced its development and instanced that where a hedge was growing of this peculiar shrub, near a wheat field, Rust was more prolific and as I understood him, this was not an isolated case. At first sight it seemed extraordinary that a shrub by its mere presence should influence the development of this fungus, but it must be admitted, strange things some times do occur. I was reminded of a circumstance in chemistry and which I have seen demonstrated that in the production of Oxygen from chlorate of potash by the addition of black oxide of manganese, the heat required was reduced to one-half, the latter was not acted upon nor changed in the least by the heat itself under other circumstances being a source of oxygen too, but acted by its mere presence. Hence it is said to act by catalysis, but after all the theory thus wise propounded to affect the development of rust, is to my mind chimerical. It was also argued by one or two others at the same meeting that its production depended upon the conditions of atmospheric influences; if peradventure it be moist and warm the succulent fibrillae of the plant draws more moisture to the stalk than the plant has power to appropriate, and hence the stalk bursts and deposits its contents on the outside of stalk. Once there, its development is obstructed, being separated from its natural correspondencies the vital forces necessary are wanting and proves to be in substance and quality a very different thing to wheat kernals—destroying also the stalk to which it adheres—for all useful purposes.

Now this to my mind is more logical than the first cause named, yet it would be interesting to me at least to know if the bursting of the straw had been demonstrated by actual observation.

I have, in the absence of its demonstration, a more simple method I think to account for its development. There is a law known in physiology as exosmosis and endosmosis, it is a beautiful provision of nature. It is a power that equalizes the fluids of the body, if too much in the blood. Exosmose throws it out—if too little, endosmose takes it in—from surrounding tissues. I merely mention this circumstance as being possible to account for the exudation said to exist upon the straw without the necessity for bursting it.

But I thought then and think still that rust may be accounted for on equally logical grounds. My reasonings are based upon the possibilities, nay the assurance that everything subject to life has in itself, germs, which if developed tend to destroy it unless in some way the parasitic or insectivorous germ be eliminated or destroyed. Such reflections were suggested upon the study of disease in the human—especially that class of diseases known as the exanthemata—diseases of childhood in chief—scarlet fever, measles, diptheria, small-pox and such like.

How, I ask, does it occur, that many persons isolated and without any manner of known contact, become victims of those diseases, and how, even on exposure, are some exempt? If you charge it to the air theory, as the carrier of those poisons, it often fails from barriers, elevation and remoteness. Contact, it is true, is a most certain mode of propagation, and no doubt something like the properties of the alleged barberry bush quickens the development of the latent germ into sure and greater activity. But even under such circumstances, with some it is harmless—not for want of germs, but because of the healthy eliminating powers of nature, refusing a nidus for its operation.

To return to the rust. It is, in my opinion, a process similar in its conditions and forces. It is a germ susceptible of life; its habitat must be somewhere; it is not a thing created simply for the occasion, nor a stain as that from a painter's brush. It is a growth, a development—not an evolution from an inorganism. It is a fungus, as stated, and depends upon conditions climatic and constitutional, so to speak; for its development, a tiny seed, which remains dormant for ages, whether in the mummy or the soil—immediately on being exposed to suitable conditions grows and increases. How very natural, then, for one to conclude, that laws nearly identical applied in each case. Neither is this condition void of further illustration. Take, if you please, the disease known commonly as SMUT. Who will deny, that the common practice of using quicklime or sulphate of copper—bluestone—upon seed wheat previously to its being sown, does not this by an instinct one would suppose, show that some germ is to be destroy'd—some enemy exterminated. Forty years ago many will recollect this practice and from that time up to the present. Now by no microscopic evidence has such a germ ever been discovered in the wheat kernal, but, notwithstanding, it is undeniable that the end generally warranted the practice.

I know that it is susceptible of another elucidation, viz., that the lime or coperas so impregnates the surrounding soil, where the grain is sown, that it prevents the malformation or malnutrition of the germ—otherwise inclined—to smut. This, too, is merely theoretical and can scarcely be accepted to be true—at least it would impinge on my theory, viz., that the virus—or whatever name you are pleased to call it—is in the grain. But, by whatever influence, no one questions the good effect of seasoning well with lime or bluestone the seed to be sown.

In referring again to the exanthemeta, let me repeat what indeed is well known, that once the disease is developed, contagion may be wide spread, prolific and fatal. Is it too much to say that upon the same theory one locality of rust affects another? Why not? It is emphatically a diseased state produced by living organisms, flung into life by suitable conditions, destructible in their nature, may not those imperceptible sporules be carried from plant to plant and point to point? and that, too, in extensive proportions and in a very short time. Many farmers may be able to confirm a fact I have noticed that, in olden time and first crops, such extensive ravages were not known so much as in later years.

The germ theory of all diseases humanity is heir to, is before the thinking world, and I am persuaded a similar law exists regarding nature in the vegetable kingdom. If by any means the germ is destroyed the disease is vanquished.

But, you ask me, have you nothing to suggest whereby this may be obtained. The answer is emphatic no!—believing, as I have endeavored to show, that it depends measurably upon atmospheric and local conditions for its development and growth. It furnishes a field for enquiry—it is an equation for practical farmers—notes should be taken and compared. The soil and location best suited for the purposes of success must be studied and the seed must be tested—for, I verily believe, if you sow smutty wheat, you will reap smut; if you sow rusty wheat in any degree you will reap rusty wheat.

Nothing can be clearer, nor is more susceptible of proof, than that unless the equilibrium of the elements—manure required for the growth and the production of the grain—be well considered, the berry must suffer proportionately, its health will be poor and its value deteriorated. Neglect like this may be a potent cause of degeneracy and disease.

What I have advanced may be quite too visionary and not at all capable of sufficient proof but if so I have the satisfaction of being in company with college professors and intelligent yeomanry of the County, which, if nothing more will cause us to think and discuss.

But, before closing, let me say, that unless such practical questions—theoretical or otherwise—on agriculture, commerce and economy be kept well in view at your gatherings, the great object intended by your existence will be missed.

These are common grounds; they interest all and give ample scope for your best minds. And I am persuaded, although not enable to annihilate immediately those pestivorous agents, the time is not far distant when I am sure their source and means of destruction will appear and pass from the mere theoretical to the positive and consequent victory.

I am obliged to you for your invitation and will ever desire and speak and seek for the benefit and elevation of the Farmers of Grey—a community on whom so much and so many depend.

Hon. C. Edwards Lester,

Late U. S. Consul to Italy, author of "The Glory and Shame of England," "America's Advancement," etc., etc., etc., writes as follows:—

New York, August 1, 1886.
122 E. 27th st.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:

My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hæmorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

Our Old Friend Neverfail.

Oh, it's good to ketch a relative 'at's richer and don't run
When you holler out to hold up, and ll joke and have his fun;
It's good to hear a man called bad and then find out he's not,
Er strike some chap they call lukewarm 'at's really red hot;
It's good to know the devil's painted jest a leetle black,
And it's good to have most anybody pat you on the back;
But best the best thing in the world's our old friend Neverfail,
When he wags yer hand as honest as an old dog wags his tail!

I like to strike the man I owe the same time I can pay,
And take back things I've borried and su'prise folks that way,
I like to find out that the man I voted fer last fall,
That didn't git elected, was a scoundrel after all;
I like the man that likes the poor and he'ps 'em when he can;
I like to meet a ragged tramp at's still a gentleman
But most I like—with you, my boy—our old friend Neverfail,
When he wags yer hand as honest as an old dog wags his tail!

A Hero at Home.

'Tis brave to be first in the battle,
And listen the plaudits men give
'Tis noble to stand amid hazard,
Or die that another may live.
Courage has stood on the ship afire,
And breasted the ocean's wild foam,
But who, in silence, grapples with fate,
And suffers?—a hero at home.

Who wooeth kindly all through the day,
And still hath a blythe look to spare,
Though the wheels of life be rough and hard
And sorrow is rife in the air.
Who will be true to hearts round the hearth
And from love's allegiance ne'er roam—
'Tis easy to strive where men look on,
But who'll be a hero at home?

There are griefs that the light may not see,
Yet sure as the tides in their flow.
There are heart pangs that never speak out,
And the passer by cannot know.
There are souls with strong yearnings for love
Yet silent as stars in the dome:
There are tears that would cry if they could
Oh! give us more heroes at home.

Though there be not a crown for the brow,
Though history's records be dumb—
Though fame to the front may not call you,
Or blazon your name when you come—
Yet, above, there's a pen and a book,
And stamped on that wondrous tome
There's a word of remembrance for Him
Who dares be a hero at home.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER XIII.

Dumfife, the nearest town both to Fairholme Court and Maxwell, was a market town of some little importance which had seen better days before travelling became the easy matter it is in this nineteenth century. Still even now it was a prosperous, well-to-do, but rather sleepy place; and the population, not being much noted for commercial enterprise, found plenty of time to discuss their neighbors' business in preference to minding their own, as the inhabitants of many similar towns seem to do.

The town was curiously and irregularly built and had been once compared to a crab, the market-place, in the very centre of the town, forming the body, while the streets, branching out in various directions, appeared to resemble limbs. There was nothing very charming or picturesque in the town itself; but it was well situated, and there were pretty walks in the neighborhood, notably a charmingly wooded and romantic road which ran along by the river side for a distance of fully two miles. The high-road leading from Maxwell into Dumfife had been greatly improved by the late owner of Maxwell, and it was now a very fair specimen of a high road, with tall hedges on either side, the distance from the one place to the other making it a tolerably agreeable drive on a fine summer day.

But it would hardly come under the category of pleasant things to take such a drive on a cold winter day early in January, and Shirley Ross, warmly wrapped in sealskin and fur as she was, shivered a little as she stood at the angle where the road leading from Fairholme Court and the one from Maxwell met, waiting for a vehicle which was coming rapidly toward her down the latter.

She was closely veiled, and her restless impatient movements, as she paced up and down the little piece of road which commanded a view of the approaching dog-cart, showed that she was considerably agitated, and, if she had not worn a thick veil, it would have been seen that her face was pale even to her lips, and that there was a wild, frightened, almost terrified glance in her beautiful eyes.

"It is fortunate that I am not given to fainting," she said to herself, with a little smile which was sad and bitter. "Once or twice I have felt so terribly like it. Oh, Guy, if you had been—, you would have spared me this! Oh, Jack, what a burden of shame you are laying upon me!"

Shirley little guessed what that burden was to be, or she would have sunk under it even in anticipation. Rapidly the dog-cart came along, drawn by a superb high-stepping black horse, driven by a singularly handsome man wearing a coat richly trimmed with fur, whose face brightened perceptibly as he caught sight of the little waiting figure moving so restlessly to and fro.

"She has not failed me then!" he said softly. "You are quite sure that all will be right, Latreille?" he added to the groom on the back seat, a fair-haired man who wore his livery in an awkward manner, as if he were not used to it.

"Quite sure, Sir Hugh," the man answered quietly, his manner totally free from the agitation which Sir Hugh could not entirely disguise, as he pulled up the dog-cart and both men alighted, Latreille going to the horse's head while Sir Hugh assisted Shirley into the dog-cart and wrapped the fur rug carefully around her.

"I am so sorry," he said softly. "I would have brought the brougham, but unfortunately there is something wrong with one of the wheels. I am afraid this will be a cold drive for you, poor child."

"It does not matter," Shirley answered faintly. "I am well wrapped up."

"After all," he continued, as he climbed up into the driving-seat by her side, "this dog-cart will be less noticeable than the brougham; and you are so closely veiled that no one could possibly recognise you. All right, Latreille."

Latreille left the horse's head, climbed rather awkwardly into the backseat, and Sir Hugh drove away down the Dumfife high-road.

"I brought Latreille instead of a groom," said Sir Hugh, with a little laugh, "because I know I can trust him. He does not wear his livery as to the 'manner born,' does he?"

"It was very thoughtful of you," Shirley said tremulously.

"I am afraid I have kept you waiting," he continued, as they drove on, "though I am rather before the time we fixed."

"It was my fault. I was much too soon," Shirley said; "but I was so restless and unhappy, and so afraid of losing an opportunity of getting away unseen, that as soon as one occurred I seized it."

"Poor little girl!" responded Sir Hugh softly. "It is hard for you; but never mind—I will take care of you now, and I will see that no harm happens to you."

"You are very good," Shirley said in her faint tremulous tones. "What should I have done without you?"

"It makes me so happy to be of any service to you," he observed rather unsteadily—for the trustful, grateful words stung him—"that I hope you will say no more about goodness, Miss Ross. It is you who are good to—to trust me," he concluded, as with an effort.

"Guy must thank you," Shirley said, with a little smile. "He, as well as myself, is fortunate in possessing so kind a friend."

Sir Hugh's handsome face flushed darkly, and he bit his lip as he brought his whip down rather sharply about his horse's ears—a proceeding which that animal so highly disapproved of that it required all Sir Hugh's attention and skill to reduce him to order again.

"You are not nervous, I hope?" he said, when Tippoo had settled down again into something like steadiness. "Tippoo is rather spirited, but he has no vice, and is perfectly safe. Why, my child, you are trembling! Were you frightened?"

"Yes, a little," Shirley confessed. "I am not used to such a high dog-cart, Sir Hugh, so you must forgive me."

"Do you think I would have brought any horse over which I had not perfect control," he said gently, "and which I could not trust? No; when I am carrying such a precious freight, I am bound to be very careful, and Tippoo is perfectly safe, I assure you."

"I think I should not have been nervous if I had not felt altogether worried and miserable," she remarked unsteadily. "I will banish my fears for the future, Sir Hugh."

"I cannot tell you how it troubles me to see you so unhappy," he said earnestly. "And indeed there is no need; all shall be well with your brother, and no one at Fairholme Court will be at all likely to know anything about your disposal of this afternoon."

"Uncle Gilbert is so stern and strict in his notions of honor," Shirley observed hesitatingly. "I am sure poor Jack would never be forgiven, Sir Hugh," she added earnestly. "I know Jack is very much to blame, but do you think—do you think that—"

"His fault is such a great one?" Sir Hugh said, cheerily. "Are you warm and comfortable my child?"

Shirley answered gratefully in the affirmative, and they went on for some time in silence, Sir Hugh's face rather set and stern as he drove along, and Shirley's thoughts wandering to her brother in his trouble, and to poor Guy, from whom she had heard that morning. A long tender letter he had sent her, though it was evident that it had been written in rather a depressed state of mind. He had found his uncle very ill, suffering great agony, and it was plain that he felt quite hopeless of his recovery.

It would be a sad grief to Major Stuart, Shirley knew, for his great-uncle was his only relative, and a close affection had existed between them. Poor Guy, the year had opened sorrowfully for him, and she would not depress him further by telling him of her trouble! That could wait until he came back, when they would forget all their unhappiness in the joy of reunion.

As they drew nearer Dumfife Shirley's anxiety grew almost unbearable. Would Jack be at the place where he had begged her to meet him? Would anything have occurred to prevent his travelling to Dumfife? Had his imprudent—nay, dishonest action been discovered? The very thought made the girl turn faint and giddy. If it had been discovered, not only would he be smashed and disgraced, but he had sworn not to survive his shame; and Shirley knew the passionate, sensitive nature of her brother well enough to be sure that he would keep his word.

And then to the excited girl's imagination appeared a vision of her brother, his blue eyes closed, his fair curls stained with blood; and her senses reeled at the thought. With a quick nervous movement she pushed up her veil to let the cold air blow upon her face, and Sir Hugh, startled by the abrupt sudden action, looked down quickly.

"Good heaven," he exclaimed, "you are ill! You are suffering greatly! What can I do for you, Shirley?"

"It is nothing," she said, throwing off the numbed feeling by a strong effort. "I was a little faint, but I am better. Do you think I might have my veil up, Sir Hugh? The wind does me good."

"Leave it up by all means," Sir Hugh answered promptly. "The chances are a thousand to one that we shall meet with no one likely to recognize you, and the inn where we are to meet your brother is an old-fashioned place. By the bye, it will be better for you to pass for Lady Glynn at the inn," he said carelessly. "It will attract less attention, and, as neither of us is known, it will not matter."

"A very insignificant Lady Glynn!" said Shirley, with a forced smile. "I should be ashamed of such a wife, Sir Hugh!"

"I could never have a more beautiful one," he returned, with a glance at her face which made Shirley regret that she had spoken.

Presently the town of Dumfife, quaint and irregular, with its market-place and rather straggling streets, came in view, and an occasional house or cottage was to be seen on the road-side.

Sir Hugh moderated Tippoo's pace as they entered the town.

"It won't do to attract attention by fast driving," he said, smiling slightly; and Shirley glanced nervously from side to side, dreading to see a face she knew.

But it was not necessary to drive fast for Sir Hugh's dog-cart to attract attention. The vehicle itself, so perfectly appointed, and the superb horse between its shafts, were not likely to pass unnoticed anywhere; nor were its occupants—the fair, splendid-looking man in his heavily furred driving-coat, and the pale, beautiful girl to whom he seemed so devoted, and for whose comfort he was so solicitous. Latreille, from his seat at the back of the dog-cart, caught many a significant glance as well as many an admiring one cast at his master and Miss Ross as the dog-cart went slowly down the High street leading into the market place, where Sir Hugh pulled up.

"Have you any idea where the Half-Moon Inn is, Latreille?" he said, turning round to his servant.

"Yes, Sir Hugh; I made a point of ascertaining. It is the last house on the opposite side of the square; it faces the drinking-fountain."

Sir Hugh drove on. It was yet early in the afternoon, and the market-place presented an animated and bustling appearance; for it was market day. Shirley shrunk back, and pulled her veil over her face. Sir Hugh, always watchful, observed the movement.

"It is unfortunate—or perhaps fortunate—for us that it is market day," he said softly. "It increases the chances of meeting an acquaintance; but it lessens our fears of attracting notice."

Shirley made no answer; she was too nervous and anxious to speak carelessly, and she did not wish to distress him by any agitation. They drove on in silence across the market-place, passed the grotesque drinking-fountain which disfigured the corner, and pulled up at a curious old-fashioned house, with latticed windows and many gables, and a low wide entrance-hall, the door of which stood wide open, while over it was a huge representation of a half-moon.

"Here we are!" Sir Hugh said cheerily, as Latreille got down from his seat and went to the horse's head. "We shall be here for an hour perhaps, so you may as well have Tippoo put up," he added, as he got down himself. "Gently my little wife!"

He turned to Shirley with a smile, and lifted her out of the dog-cart with a care and tenderness that she could not but feel, although she was trembling in every limb and hardly able to stand from excess of agitation. Sir Hugh, seeing her condition, drew her hand through his arm, and led her into the low broad entrance hall, where they were met by a cheerful, kindly-looking woman, with a gaudily-ribboned cap.

"Good-afternoon, sir," she said civilly, but in rather an independent manner. "What can I do for you? I am afraid," she added more gently, as Shirley's trembling fingers pushed up her veil as she gasped for breath, "that the lady is ill."

"My wife is not very strong," said Sir Hugh quietly. "I suppose we can have a private sitting-room here for an hour or two?"

"Certainly, sir," the landlady answered, promptly. "Although it is market-day, I can accommodate you. This way, sir, if you please."

"One moment," he said quietly, obeying the slight pressure of the little hand trembling upon his arm. "Is there a gentleman here waiting for Sir Hugh and Lady Glynn?"

The landlady paused, and there was a shade more deference in her manner as she answered—

"There is no gentleman here, sir, except our regular customers. Were you expecting—Dear me, sir, her ladyship is very ill!" she added, breaking off suddenly, as she saw how Shirley drooped over the strong arm on which she leant, and the ghastly pallor of the lovely young face.

"It is nothing," Shirley managed to whisper, as Sir Hugh placed her on a chair and the landlady held a glass of water to the quivering lips. "I am better; please leave me—please leave me with my husband."

She spoke the words almost unconsciously in her anxiety to be alone for a moment with Sir Hugh, and she did not see the sudden flush of triumph which overspread the handsome face bending over her.

"Will you be kind enough to see that there is a good fire in the sitting-room?" Sir Hugh said quietly. "Lady Glynn is very tired, and will be glad to rest. We will follow you in a moment."

The landlady courtesied and went away, and Shirley turned anxiously to Sir Hugh.

"What has happened? What has kept him?" she said breathlessly. "Do you think there has been any mistake?"

"There has been no mistake, and there is no occasion for such terrible distress, dear child," he answered soothingly. "Your brother may have been detained, but he will be here shortly. Come—take courage! Poor Jack will be in despair if he thinks that he has given you so much trouble," he added, smiling.

"What can have detained him?" Shirley repeated once or twice; and then she dropped her head on her hands for a moment.

"I am going to post Latreille as sentry," said Sir Hugh cheerfully. "He must waylay Jack, you know, and tell him to ask for Lady Glynn."

He left her for a few moments, and Shirley made a desperate effort to regain some semblance of composure. When he returned, she had succeeded to a certain degree, and was able to look up and thank him for his kindness.

"Don't thank me," he said quickly; "your gratitude seems to hurt me. It is such pleasure to me to do anything for my precious little wife. But come," he added quickly, regretting his words when he saw that they made her shrink from him a little—"you are able to go up now, and it is just as well not to remain in this draughty passage any longer."

Shirley rose at once, and he gave her his arm. She was still giddy enough to render its support, if not absolutely needful, very grateful to her, as she climbed up the stairs rather wearily. At the top, standing in the dark, but not uncomfortable-looking landing, the landlady was waiting for them, while from an open door came the cheerful ruddy blaze of a coal-fire which was burning in the sitting-room into which she ushered them.

"I hope your ladyship will find everything comfortable," she said importantly. "Can I do anything more for you, sir?"

"I dare say my wife will like some tea or coffee," Sir Hugh answered, in as matter-of-fact a way as if he and Shirley had been man and wife for years. "Which will you have, Shirley? Nonsense, dear—you must have something. I think some coffee will be best for you. You may send us some coffee," he added, turning to the landlady. "Let it be good, if you please."

"We can but try, sir," she said good-humoredly, as she courtesied and left the room; and Sir Hugh, after seeing that she had closed the door after her, went over to the fire and poked it, glancing furtively as he did so at the drooping slender figure resting so wearily on the horse-hair covered sofa.

"I think you will be more comfortable if you try this chair," he said cheerily, pulling up a deep old arm-chair covered with faded red damask to the fire. "That looks a most uninviting couch. I have stationed Latreille on the pavement with injunctions to accost any one and every one at all answering to the description of your brother and to bring him up at once."

"Thank you," Shirley returned wearily. "You are very good."

"Then reward me for my goodness—since you persist in calling it so in spite of my entreaties—by acceding to my request and trying this arm-chair. Poor child, how weary you are!" he added as she came over to the fire and dropped into the chair.

"I am not weary at all," she answered, trying to speak indifferently, but failing; "but I am so anxious about Jack."

"I assure you there is no need," he said soothingly. "He has to change trains at Weldon Junction; and this is a tiresome line just about here. On the day I came from town we had to wait an hour at Weldon for a train to Dumfife."

"Do you think that that is the reason of the delay?" the girl asked eagerly, catching at anything which would alleviate the agony of suspense that she was enduring.

"I have no doubt of it," he replied confidently. "Now let me take off your coat," he added bending over her. "If you don't, you will not feel the benefit of it when you go out; and you have another long cold drive before you."

"I shall not feel the cold going back if my mind is at ease about Jack," she said, submitting to his touch, as he gently and lingeringly removed her wraps, partly because she was too sick at heart to oppose him, and partly because she felt grateful for the kindness and consideration he had shown her throughout the afternoon; and Sir Hugh felt his hand shake as it touched hers accidentally as he removed her sealskin coat, and his heart beat fast.

At that moment, when he was bending over her as she stood, with more tenderness on his face and in his manner than she knew, the room door opened, and Sir Hugh turned quickly with a muttered exclamation of annoyance, to see a neatly dressed maid-servant standing on the threshold.

"I beg your pardon, sir," she said. "I did knock, and I thought some one told me to come in. My mistress wishes to know if you will have anything to eat with the coffee."

Sir Hugh turned to Shirley, who made a little negative gesture, and sat down in the old red chair, coloring hotly, even in her anxiety, with annoyance at the servant's entrance at such an inopportune moment.

"It does not matter," Sir Hugh said, smiling at her when the maid had disappeared. "It is the most natural thing in the world for a husband to remove his wife's coat surely; and, as she is under the impression that we are man and wife, she would think no more of such a trifling occurrence. It is new and pleasant to me," he added, "to have a lady to take care of that I am afraid of forgetting any of the little attentions which husbands generally pay their wives."

"Not generally," Shirley corrected lightly, "only occasionally."

"Is that all? Then I will amend my phrase and say 'attentions which husbands ought always to pay their wives.' How cold your hands are, my child! They are quite benumbed. Let me warm them for you."

Nothing could have exceeded the gentle kindliness of Sir Hugh's manner, which, although perfectly friendly and even tender, had nothing love-like about it. He was a good actor, and he saw that the little outburst of tenderness to which he had given way for a moment in the hall had startled and distressed her, and he was careful to avoid giving her any further cause. Even when he took her little numbed hands, and chafed them gently in his, it was done in a manner which could not offend her; and Shirley submitted and smiled a little, and was so irresistibly charming in her softened anxious mood, with the violet shadows lying dark and deep under the sweet eyes, that Sir Hugh had some difficulty in repressing the mad passionate words which rose to his lips.

When the landlady herself appeared, carrying a tray with a tete-a-tete coffee-service, Sir Hugh lingeringly relinquished the little hands and turned to the table. The buxom hostess placed the tray before Shirley, courtesied and inquired if they wanted anything else, and left the room to report to the bar-maid what a devoted husband Sir Hugh Glynn was.

"But perhaps she is not his wife at all," said the bar-maid dubiously. "She is quite young, Mrs. Home."

"Not too young to be married," declared Mrs. Home decidedly. "I was married at 17 myself; and she called him her husband," she added; "and folks don't do that in Scotland, unless they are married—it is not safe. Who is your master, young man?" she went on, as Latreille, tired of his station in the cold, came into the bar to get a glass of warm ale.

"Sir Hugh Glynn of Maxwell," Latreille answered promptly.

"I thought so. Old Adam Glynn's nephew, I reckon," said Mrs. Home, adding, in a diplomatic manner, "has he been long married?"

Latreille looked up coolly, and his keen blue eyes were fixed steadily on the buxom inquisitive face.

"No," he said quietly; "they have not been long married. You might have guessed that from his manner, I should think. He's far too devoted to have been married long. But if you want to know if they are married, I am quite willing to gratify you. They are married," he added emphatically, "and no mistake about that."

"She's very pretty, but she's not to compare with him," remarked the bar-maid, with a coquettish glance at the valet, who was getting more accustomed to his smart livery.

"Pretty?" he returned carelessly. "Do you call her pretty? Well, she is generally reckoned so, I believe, but she is far too lackadaisical for my taste. And as for her figure, she is as thin as a lath! Give me bright eyes and red cheeks and a waist like yours, my dear," he added, with easy foreign gallantry, as he drained his glass. "None of your lily-faced whimsical fine ladies for me!"

"Sir Hugh seems very fond of his lady," remarked Mrs. Home, not quite approving of the turn the conversation was taking.

"Fond of her!" echoed Latreille. "He worships the ground she walks on! If she liked to walk upon gold, she might. It's a perfect infatuation!"

At that moment, while Mrs. Home and the bar-maid were pondering the good fortune of the young lady who was so beloved by such a wealthy and handsome gentleman, a young man, looking pale and eager and haggard, stopped on the pavement outside, and looked up at the huge gaudy crescent over the door.

"This must be it," he said to himself, with a sigh of relief. "The letter said the Half Moon Inn in the market-place. I wonder how she managed to come, poor child. Well, it is the last time I shall ever have to give her so much sorrow, I trust."

He went into the hall, glanced with eager blue eyes about him, and went straight on to the bar where the landlady was still enjoying a chat with Latreille. He was a slight young man, handsome, for all the marks of dissipation visible in the pallor of his face and the worn tired eyes, with a sensitive tender mouth, which was shaded by a slight mustache.

"I beg your pardon," he said, hastily, lifting his hat courteously with rather a foreign grace of manner—a salutation which the valet returned with equal grace. "I was to meet a lady here, and—"

"Excuse me, sir," Latreille said, starting forward. "You are Mr. Ross, I believe?"

"Yes," the young man answered, hesitatingly, a look of fear crossing his face as he glanced at the unfamiliar face of Sir Hugh's servant.

"You were to meet Sir Hugh and Lady Glynn at the Half-Moon Inn, sir," continued Latreille, quietly. "My master and mistress are waiting for you upstairs. It is all right, sir," he added, hastily, seeing the young man's hesitation. "I will show you the way."

The Restless Small Boy.

"Sit still, Freddie."

"I am."

Mamma spoke languidly, being interested in the drapery of the skirts of a woman in the corner of the horse car, and in trying to determine whether her sacque was of real seal-skin or only seal plush.

"Keep your muddy feet off the seat of the car, Freddie."

"What hurt will they do?"

"You'll get the cushion all muddy."

"It'll dry, and scrape off."

"No, it won't, and—there, you're getting mud all over the dress of that lady! Beg pardon, ma'am. Now, get down."

"I want to see out the window."

"Oh, there's nothing to see."

"There is, too."

"Stop drumming so on the window."

"Why?"

"It's annoying; that's why. Don't flatten your nose out on the glass like that. Sit down."

"Don't want to."

"You shall never go down town with me again. Don't whistle in the car."

"Can't I do anything?"

"Yes; keep still, and be a little man. Don't twist around so in your seat."

"I ain't twisting around."

"I'd like to know what you call it, then. Now, now; let my bundles alone."

"I want to see what's in 'em."

"Well, you can't until we get home."

"Why?"

"Because you can't. Now, look at you! Sticking your feet out for that lady to fall over. Come on! This is our corner. I'll tend to you when we get home."

One Will Pray and the Other Won't.

The Archbishop of York has issued a prayer asking God "to remove this great trial which Thou has sent us"—i. e., the smallpox epidemic. On this Dr. Dallinger, of Sheffield, who is an eminent man of science as well as a divine, says:

"I will yield to no man in reverence for true prayer; but I will tell you without flinching that I cannot, and I will not, pray for the removal of the smallpox scourge. It would be a mockery of God. Let us do our best, and then in baffled agony cry to God for help. But here we have not helped ourselves, and how dare we ask the Almighty to help us? Let us do our duty, act up to our knowledge, and as surely as the smallpox curse came among us by physical laws broken, so it will depart from us if we see to it that physical laws are obeyed."—London Truth.

Anxious to Meet a Burglar.

A friend warns us to fasten our doors and windows securely at night for fear of burglars, but a good, medium-sized burglar, with money in his pocket, would be a god-send to us at present. Come on, gentlemen—one at a time! Everything is wide open and waiting for you.—Smithville (Ga.) News.

AN ENGLISH TRAGEDY.

Murder of a Wife and Six Children by a Chemist.

SUICIDE OF THE MURDERER.

A Manchester correspondent sends the following particulars of a shocking crime which was committed in Salford on Monday week, as briefly reported by cable: A family named Derby occupied a small but decent house in Garfield street. The family consisted of Samuel H. Derby, aged about 35; his wife, apparently a little older; and six children—Ernest Llewellyn, aged 13; Harold Percy, 11; Frederick Cecil, 9; Clara Elizabeth, 7; Florence Helen, 5, and Gladys, 3. The father was a chemist and herbalist, and there was no evidence of want or grinding poverty in their surroundings. Nothing of an unusual character took place in the proceedings of the family until Tuesday, when it was noticed that none of them appeared. On Tuesday and Wednesday nothing was heard of them, but as their neighbors were used to their absence, little was thought about it. On Thursday morning the first inquiry was made by Derby's sister, who lives in the adjoining street. She called at her brother's house to inquire as to their welfare, and was surprised at finding it locked up. This circumstance she reported to her father, and he went and tried to get into the house, but failed. Yesterday morning the aged father and his daughter made another attempt. Again failing, he procured a ladder and, climoing to the back bed-room window, saw Mrs. Derby and two children in bed, apparently asleep. Bursting into the room, he found that they were all dead. An alarm was raised and a further search was made. In another bed-room, lying in perfect repose, and with the bed-clothes neatly folded over them, were four other children, also dead; and in the kitchen, lying on his side on the sofa, the body of the man Derby was also found. All eight members of the family were thus discovered lifeless. The faces of all the dead were peaceful, showing that no struggle had taken place and that no violence had been used. The police were hastily summoned, and their inquiries and researches made it evident that a terrible series of murders had been committed, probably by the father, who had afterwards taken his own life. On the table beside him were two bottles, one marked "Prussic acid," and the other "Chlorale hydrate." In the bed-room in which the children were lying was a tea-cup containing a milk-like fluid. Inquiries from the neighbors showed that Derby had been for some time a little queer. His troubles arose not from want, but from other forms of money troubles. He was interested in a will, from which he expected to derive considerable benefit, but some dispute arose, and the matter caused the man much distress. The deferred hope in connection with his expected bequest, which he never received, seems to have preyed on his mind and unhinged it. There seems undoubted evidence that the crime was premeditated. This is made clear by various letters which are in the possession of the police, in which he makes reference to his intention of doing away with himself, and says he has told his wife, and she is willing to go with him. The most important letter bearing on the point is one addressed to his sister, a Mrs. Booth, who resides at Eccles. In this he says: "I cannot leave my darling wife and children behind. In fact, Annie often said she did not want to live after I went, and when I told her a few days ago that I could not stand this any longer, she said she was quite ready to go. I wish our bodies to be sent to Owens College for dissection, etc. If they are buried, let the funeral be conducted in the quietest way possible and at the least expense."

A PROBABLE CAUSE.

Police records have been sought in vain for a parallel so far as the extent of the tragedy is concerned; but its whole surroundings are charged with pathos, and destitute of anything in the way of brutality. Samuel Hall Derby, the leading actor in the dreadful drama, had been well brought up, and until a short time ago was in comfortable circumstances. He was the manager of a large chemist and druggist business, and besides making a fair income had considerable prospects from a maternal uncle who farmed a good estate in the County of Derry. About three years ago, however, his health failed, and he was compelled to give up his situation. He complained of pains in his head, and it was discovered that an abscess had formed. This, after a time, as it was thought, was removed, and after a six months' stay at Colwyn Bay, with his family, he returned to Salford in improved health and in good spirits. He told a friend that he thought he should recover, but within a few weeks of his return he had another relapse. This time he showed signs of derangement, and he was sent twelve months ago to Ireland to stay with his uncle. Here he was treated with much kindness, and his health improved. Last August his uncle died. The trouble broke out again; his mind was quite unhinged, and when, in the following month, he returned to Salford he took with him his uncle's will and a number of documents referring to the estate. This prevented the will being proved, but no amount of persuasion would induce him to part with any of the documents, because, he said, his brothers, who were co-beneficiaries with him, wanted to rob him. When he returned to Salford, he went to live in the small house in Garfield street which has been the scene of the tragedy. These facts, which were elicited on Saturday, leave no room to doubt the unfortunate man's state of mind. There is nothing to lead to the belief that his wife was similarly affected. In one of his letters, however, he says that his wife was quite ready to die with him, and in a letter which was discovered on Saturday he asserts that his dear wife took her dose like a lamb.

WAS THE WIFE A PARTY TO THE CRIME?

Not a few people think that both parents were concerned in the murder of the children, and that the husband gave the fatal dose to his wife. Then he wrote some letters, and finally poisoned himself. The bodies of the seven victims found upstairs were undressed, and were lying in bed as if asleep. They had evidently been carefully arranged after death. The body of the husband was fully dressed, even to his overcoat, and he was found lying on the sofa in the kitchen. Considerable speculation has arisen as to the agent employed in the destruction of all the lives, and though several cups were found upstairs, and one on the floor near the sofa in the kitchen, there was no smell to give any clue to the nature of the poison employed. This doubt has now been set at rest by the post mortem examination, which was made on Saturday by Dr. Wilson, a local physician. He commenced with the body of the man, which he found to be well nourished and healthy so far as the trunk organs were concerned. When the stomach was opened a strong smell of prussic acid was emitted, and the cause of death was at once disclosed. Dr. Wilson contented himself with an internal examination of only one of the other seven bodies. In this case precisely similar symptoms were at once discovered. In the case of the other six persons the doctor contented himself with an examination, but was able to declare that the cause of death was the same in all the cases. Derby, as a chemist, was fully acquainted with the character and effects of various poisons, and he seems to have selected one which, though certain in its action, was quick and gave little or no pain. There is no distortion of features in any case and all appear to have died calmly. In a box in one of the bed-rooms was discovered the will and documents relating to the Irish property which have caused so much trouble, and finally unhinged the mind of the unfortunate man. His father, who is over 70 years of age, has been interviewed, but is unable to throw any more light on the affair.

A TOUCHING INCIDENT.

The deceased was musically inclined and played the harmonium which he possessed with considerable facility. In pathetic contrast to the awful tragedy which has taken place is the fact that yesterday week the poor children gathered round their parents in the warm glow of the sitting-room fire, and whilst the dead man played the harmonium they sang with the melodious sweetness of childhood the hymn, "Take, oh! take me to Thy care." Such was their last song on earth—the significance of which is as overwhelming as the catastrophe which followed. Less than twenty hours after their childish lips formed the innocent invocation they were truly at rest—in the sleep that knows no awakening.

UNDER 130 FEET OF SNOW.

An Astonishing Story About a Great Slide in Idaho—Two Men Packed in for Forty-Eight Hours.

A San Francisco despatch says: John M. Duncombe, who has just come down to the city from Alturas, Idaho, tells the story of a queer happening there a week or two ago.

"Five men were working at a shaft located about half-way up the side of Silverton Hill, a spur of the Alturas range. The snow lies several feet deep all over the mountain, and, as the day was clear, by the middle of the afternoon the sun had thawed the snow just enough to make it soft and inclined to slide. A Swede walking on a trail above the shaft missed his footing, and in scrambling to regain it pushed a little body of snow out of its balance. This was at the head of a dry gulch, and the weight and slipperiness of the snow were enough to start a slide. In a second's time it had grown to a tremendous size, and, growing bigger every second, it rushed down the mountain with a terrible roar. The trees in its path were mowed down like grass before a scythe. The Swede who started the slide fell over in it, his body was buried in the snow, and had not been found when I came away.

"Two men were working the windlass at the mouth of the shaft and two others were inside. The two at the surface heard the slide coming and hurried to get out of its way. They were caught in the vast mass of rushing snow and tumbling trees. But by some unexplainable accident they were tossed to one side and succeeded in getting out of the avalanche. They were knocked senseless, but received no serious injuries.

"But the queerest part of the whole story is about the two men who were inside the shaft. The slide came right down over the mouth of the shaft and packed its 130 feet chock full of snow. The two men, Martin Smithson and Tom Callan, were in there, buried under all that mass of snow, for two days and nights, and when they were dug out they came to, and are now just as sound and well as anybody! The snow was packed into some parts of the shaft so tight that it was almost as hard as ice, and it took exceedingly hard work to get it out. But the snow, no matter how tightly it is packed, does not exclude the air, and that is the way they happened to live through. They were caught in upright positions, too, or they could hardly have survived. There they stood for forty-eight hours, with the snow packed around them so close that they could not move a muscle. Though so near each other they almost touched, they could not even speak a word. They could just simply stand there and think. They say they were conscious for some time after the snow came down, and that they suffered tortures. They declare they never longed for anything so much in all their lives as they did for death."

Mr. Prior's Strange Visitor.

ast Sunday morning, at the unseasonable hour of 3 o'clock, a young woman in an utterly nude condition called at the house of Mr. Thomas W. Prior, the business manager of the Chicago Opera House. She seemed to be dazed, and not a word of information could be drawn from her as to whence she had come or why she was without clothing. The whole household was aroused, and the young woman was soon decently clothed by the ladies. She made no resistance to whatever was done to her, and seemed to be almost oblivious to her surroundings and even to her own existence, save when, now and then, she burst out crying. Of course, every effort was made to sooth her, and she was at last induced to take some sleep, from which it was supposed she would awake in a better condition of mind; and, indeed, she did seem brighter for the short nap, but still would speak no word to tell who she was or why she was there. She is a very beautiful young woman, and Mr. and Mrs. Prior have become considerably interested in her; but, though she has now been an inmate of their house for two days, she has not yet been induced to tell anything of herself—whence she came or why she was in the unaccountable condition in which she presented herself. Mr. Prior's family physician has been called in, and it is his opinion that the young woman is neither dumb nor permanently lacking in intelligence, yet he is as unable as the rest to explain her presence there. He thinks, however, that she is improving, and that in time she will be able to tell who she is and dispel some of the mystery that now surrounds her case. —Chicago Times.

A Radical Woman on Dress Reform.

Several noble English women have recently cast aside all prejudice and fear of prejudice and gone to earning money in business. As they have all succeeded, the innovation promises to increase. As dress makers and milliners they are making fortunes. A radical woman laments this and deplores the fact that the craze for new, expensive, and often injurious styles of dress continues. She says:

"I honestly believe that the abuses of dress are due to a neglect to educate girls to appreciate the importance of good physical development. Children are born with just the capacity that parents choose to give them, and when people come to see that with themselves rests the destiny of those who come after them, there will be more radical men and women. When girls are educated for some occupation or profession they will have less time to dress for the approbation of men in general."

Grass Widows Get No Insurance.

One of the most important judicial decisions ever rendered in this State was delivered in the Circuit Court by Judge Kirk Hawes yesterday. A member of one of the secret mutual benefit associations had insured his life for his wife, giving her name, as the beneficiary, in the amount of $2,000. He subsequently procured a divorce from his wife for her marital misconduct, but he did not change the certificate of insurance in her behalf. After his death the society refused to pay her the amount of the policy on the ground that before his death she had ceased to be his wife, and that after his death she was neither his widow nor his heir. Judge Hawes decided on these grounds that the divorced wife was not entitled to the amount of the insurance.—Chicago Journal.

ELAINE'S LOST LOVER.

In the Guise of a Tramp He Witnesses Her Wedded Happiness.

In 1861 there lived in the lower part of this county, near Sandy Ridge Post-office, an old lady by the name of Swann, and with her a grand-daughter, Miss Elaine Marston, a most lovely girl of 16 summers. Adjoining their home was the plantation of Judge Miller, the wealthy father of the handsome young Harry, the devoted sweetheart of the beautiful Elaine. Harry was two years her senior, and when the order for all Georgia's sons between the ages of 18 and 50 years to go to the front came, he at once began preparation with all the ardor and enthusiasm of the Southern youth at that time. His last parting was with his "little sweetheart," as he fondly called her, and his promises to return and make her his bride were sealed by many a pure kiss of love and tender embrace. For a while letters—letters full of tenderness, love and devotion—came, filling the heart of Elaine with joy and brightest hopes of the future. Suddenly they cease and then comes one written by a friend telling of the capture of young Harry, the bravest of the brave, and his incarceration in a Yankee prison. Months of sorrow and anxiety follow, and then comes the sad news of his death brought by some "exchanges" from the prison in which he was confined. The grief of Elaine was terrible, but the young heart, however fondly it may love, however bitterly it may suffer, seldom breaks, and in a few years the image of handsome Harry was but a dim shadow, and the slender, delicate girl had developed into a handsome, charming woman. She had many admirers, and on Dec. 25th, 1869, eight years after the departure of her boy lover, Elaine Marston stood at the altar to become the wife of one of Henry County's most respected citizens. Last week a man in the disguise of an old tramp passed through Hampton and inquired for the home of Mrs. ——. He found the place, beheld the face of his once promised bride, bright and happy with the love of a devoted husband, bright and interesting children and the many comforts of a beautiful country home, and returned here to take the cars for his home in the far West, not as a tramp, however, but as a handsome gentleman, stout and hearty, and with only a few silver hairs upon his temples. He told us of his life in prison until the close of the war, of the false report which reached him of the marriage of Elaine, before his release, which nearly drove him mad; of his wonderful success in life in California, and last, of the report brought across the continent that Elaine did not marry till 1869, and was now a widow; the latter part of which he did not know to be false until he begged bread at her door. He says he will never visit Georgia again; that his people are dead, his heart's best love seared and withered, and nothing remains for him but to go forever from the scenes of his childhood and the land of his birth, to spend the remainder of his life as best he can in honoring the God who gave it. He has many old comrades in arms in this section, who will, doubtless, recognize in Harry Miller one of the many brave boys sent out by our dear old county to fight for our honor, our freedom and our homes.—*Hampton (Ga.) The Highlanders at the Battle of Alma.

Our fine brigade of Guards was severely cut up when the Highlanders drew near and then, as Kinglake tells us, a man in one of the regiments reforming on the slope cried, in the deep and honest bitterness of his heart, "Let the Scotchmen go on; they'll do the work!" and with his three kilted battalions, Sir Colin, whose horse was shot under him, advanced to meet twelve of the enemy. "Now, men," said he, "you are going into action, and remember this, that whoever is wounded I don't care what his rank is—must lie where he falls. No soldier must carry off wounded men. If any man does such a thing, his name shall be stuck up in his parish kirk. Be steady—keep silence—fire low! Now, men, the army is watching us! Make me proud of my Highland Brigade!" So beautifully does the author of Eothen—an eye-witness of this part of the battle—describe their movements, that we cannot resist quoting him again. "The ground they had to ascend was a good deal more steep and broken than the slope close beneath the redoubt. In the land where the Scots are bred there are shadows of sailing clouds skimming up the mountain side, and their paths are rugged and steep—yet their course is smooth, easy and swift. Smoothly, easily and swiftly the Black Watch seemed to glide up the hill. A few instants before, and their tartans ranged the dark valley; now their plumes were on the crest." Another line came on in echelon, and another still—the Cameron and the Sutherland Highlanders. And now, to the eyes of the superstitious Russians, the strange uniforms of those bare-kneed troops seemed novel, and even terrible; their white, waving sporrans were taken for the heads of low horses: and they cried to each other that the angel of light had departed and that the demon of death had come. A close and deadly fire was now poured into these "gray blocks," as Russell calls the Russian squares. No particular sound followed, save the yells of the wounded, while the Highlanders "cast about" to reload; but after their next volley a strange rattling noise was heard, as the bullets fell like rain among the tin canteens and kettles which the enemy carried outside their knapsacks, for they were all right-about face now. A wail of despair floated over those gray-coated masses of Muscovite infantry as they broke and fled, throwing away muskets, knapsacks and everything that might encumber their flight; and now for the first time rose the Highland cheer. —Cassell's British Battles on Land and Sea.

HAPPY LAND!

A Country which Has Possessed Home Rule for 1,000 Years.

A thousand years of Home Rule ought to be an interesting subject of contemplation just now. Yet for no less a period has the Isle of Man enjoyed a political constitution of its own, first founded for it by King Orry, the Norseman, who was welcomed as a ruler by the Manxmen, and whose grave is still pointed out in "th' island" (as the Lancashire folk call it). The "Westminster Review," gives an account of that constitution. The "Kingdom of Man" was first taken possession of by Edward I. at the desire of its inhabitants. He nominated its Governor or King, which office was hereditary in the Stanley family for over 300 years, when it passed by inheritance to the Duke of Athole, who sold his rights to the British Parliament in 1765—£70,000 being paid to him and £416,114 to his heirs for the revenues of the island. It still makes it own laws. These are framed by the House of Keys, established by King Orry; and after the statutes have been sanctioned by the Queen and Council they are promulgated to the people on the Tynwald Hill every July. From this hill, which is a small mound of earth brought in portions from each of the seventeen parishes of the island, the laws are read to the assembled multitude. The Manx Parliament consists of the King, or Governor; of the Upper House, or Council (sitting by right of office), consisting of the Treasurer, the Bishop, the Judges, etc., and of the Keys or Commons, 24 in number, elected for seven years by the voters of the sheadings and towns. The Governor can dissolve this House when he likes. Bills are introduced in either House, passed on to the other, considered by both at a joint meeting in Tynwald, signed and sent to the Queen for her assent, and then publicly promulgated to the people. A £4 ownership or tenancy of a freehold, or a £10 occupancy of other premises, gives a vote by the House of Keys Election Act, 1881. The same Act gave the franchise to unmarried women possessed of the property—but not to those who have only the tenancy—qualification. Women also have a right to half the marital property on the death of the husband. The laws used to be promulgated by the Deemsters or Judges, who also presided at the jail deliveries, and who swear to administer justice "as indifferently as the herring backbone doth lie in the midst of the fish." This was intended to remind the Deemster of his oath every time he ate his daily meal, of which the herring formed a principal part. Fishing is still the chief industry of the island. Its ancient Bishopric of Sodor and Man used to include the Southern Hebrides—Sordorenses, or Southern Isles, whence the name "Sodor." The revenue of the island was, for 1886, £55,000, and its expenditure £50,000. By an Act of 1866 the whole of the Customs revenue was devoted to the purposes of the island, except £10,000, which is the contribution for Imperial protection. A school is provided in every parish, and education is compulsory. The Legislature is a thoroughly independent body; but the people value the connection with Great Britain, and are exceedingly loyal

No More Bridesmaids.

One of the notable features of ashion this year will be the gradual disappearance of bridesmaids from weddings. Nothing can be prettier, in theory always and occasionally in reality, than a group of white-clad maidens attending their friend to the altar and illuminating the scene with their decorative presence. But, under existing arrangements, bridesmaids are a very expensive luxury. The bridegroom has not only to give each one of them a daintily-costly present, but he is expected to furnish them with bouquets as well. There has, of late, been a tendency towards very tiny bridesmaids, whose tender age would naturally reduce the expense of the presents in proportion to their years. But even these are disappearing in favor of small so-called pages, who know so little of a page's duties that they alternately tread on the bride's train and trot after it, but who do not expect either jewellery or bouquets. The fact is, that bridesmaids have, so to speak, raised their terms to such an exalted height that human nature, in the shape of exasperated bridegrooms, has begun to ask if they cannot be dispensed with. And this will certainly come about unless, as in "Ruddigore," there should be established an organized brigade of bridesmaids ready with their services on every occasion and anxious to "Hail the bridegroom" in consideration of a very trifling fee. There are rumors of sharp practice on the part of young ladies who love jewellery more than is meet, and have been rashly asked to "choose something" for themselves as the bridegroom's gift. Diamonds are like horses in one respect, viz., that few people seem to be able to resist cheating about them, more or less. On the occasion of a recent wedding affairs assumed another phase in connection with the bridesmaids' present. Ten girls can hardly expect to be of one mind on such a subject, and the bridegroom unwittingly cast a veritable firebrand among them by saying he would leave the choice to them. To alter the simile, he thereby sowed dissension among them and reaped confusion and disaster. Only two of the ten were unanimous, and on the wedding day the bride found herself shorn of four of her friends, who had quarrelled irretrievably. Bridesmaids have simply extinguished themselves, and it is more than possible that a hundred years hence the social chronicler will be "reading up" their functions and duties with a view to suggesting the revival of a pretty but obsolete old custom.—London Daily News.

Maxwell School Matters.

To the Editor of The Advance.

Dear Sir,—On reading the first two lines in the second paragraph of W. Long's letter in last weeks issue I was about to draw the inference that there was a vacant seat in the ring when the third and fourth lines removed my suspense and immediately solved the ambiguity.

How greatly to be deplored: that such a talented man as Mr. Long pregnant with so much information beneficent to his fellow supporters has not tact enough to maintain his chagrin, though his greatest natural gift, and not angrily parade it in print.

If brawling or babbling could gain for him public esteem, long ago would he have reached a pinnacle of perfection and stood as an omen of unrecorded rivalry far beyond the height of human aspiration. I had never thought I would so often require space in your paper, to contradict statements so inexpressibly disgraceful but since W. Long has so many times taken up his pen of bitter resentment against me neither to obtain integrity for himself though he cannot possibly possess any nor to maintain it for those who have it, but simply to quell his insatiable appetite sordid with revenge and to degenerate me below a level of human recognition, should I allow the perverse biped to run unchecked his merciless career my reputation would soon be trodden beyond redemption. So therefore, I think I am justified in retaliating and will give his nefarious effusions that merit and requital they deserve, which is emphatic contradiction. I think I could not be endorsed with the slightest spark of Canadian heroism should I remain silent because it only adds fresh fuel to his burning frenzy.

He says he can furnish good reliable evidence to back home his false insinuations. I fear that idea is as erroneous and absurd as the boy who wanted to lengthen his shirt by taking a piece from the back of its neck and sewing to the other end; or if he does his evidence will be homogeneous with his accusations or twigs pulled from the limbs of the ring. Let him bring on his evidence then I shall no longer battle against odds I have sufficient reinforcement to remove the load of disrespect he is trying to heap on me.

Evidence is all's required to bring decisive victory. Since he has started out with his dirty balderdash I am determined to adhere to the end and not surrender on the point of success. Use your pen, Mr. Long, for the world has arrived at such a stage in civilization the pen has greater predominance than the sword. I appeal for no mercy; all I want is justice.

Washington Territory.

To the Editor of The Advance.

Dear Sir,—According to promise I think it is time I should give you another sketch of how I am getting along in this mountainous country.

With regard to the weather. In the first place, last Spring opened rather late and the Summer season was unusually wet which caused the crops to be about three weeks late. But very good all around. The threshing record shows for Egypt (1884) 23,100 bushels. This last year the threshing record is a trifle short of 60,000 bushels. Of course there was quite an arcreage sown. I consider that this is a very good showing for the third crop, for this small place. Our winter set in on Christmas Eve. Since then we have had very cold weather. The first two weeks in the new year the thermometer was below zero with little or no wind; on the 25th we had a general break up which left the snow thread bare. Strangers that come here are at a loss to know how we can raise such crops with so little rain. The whole secret is this: the land is very deep and porous which causes it to retain the rain and melted snow. This is drawn down to the surface by the heat of the sun through the summer.

Wheat never heaves here with the frost and is not troubled with insect pests. Vegetables grow here to a large size. We have onions that measure five inches across; carrots that measure five inches in circumference and twenty inches long.

I saw Mr. T. R. Moore a few days ago. He is well, happy and quite contented with the change he made and is doing well. He has built himself a fine bank barn last summer finished with dressed lumber. Three years ago he raised 72 bush. wheat; this year he has raised 3,270 bush. of grain besides cutting 40 acres of hay and has got 100 acres of fall wheat growing.

I have had several letters from parties in Artemesia asking my advice with regard to coming to this country. To such I would say that if they have not got courage enough to come out and see for themselves, as I did, they will not be advised to do so by me. For my part this country suits me in every respect I think it a country for a man that has some energy and push in him, but idlers and loafers are not much use anywhere.

With regard to school we are a little behind here and will remain so until the Territory is admitted into Statehood as the public lands set apart for schools do not come into market until that time. This year we will draw public money sufficient to keep the school for seven months in this District. We have our new schoolhouse in course of erection, 24 x 36, frame. With regard to church we have had preaching from three different denominations. The Presbyterians are represented by the Rev. John McArthur, from Kincardine, Bruce Co., Ontario. I consider this a very moral and sober community. Also the Indians on their reservations have regular services.

Now, a few words about big threshing and I am through. Our best days threshing for this season was 1,742 bus. of headed oats and 1,570 bus. of band oats. In 5 hours and 30 minutes 1,100 bush. of headed oats.

Yours &c.,

Cheerful Women.

Men should seek in marriage women of a happy disposition. They make a terrible mistake when they marry for beauty or for style. The sweetest wives are those who possess the magic secret of being cheerful under any and all circumstances. Rich or poor high or low, it makes no difference. The bright little fountain bubbles up just as musically in their hearts, no trouble is too serious for them, to make the best of it. Joyous hearted people dont know half the good they do, no matter how cross and crabbed you feel. No matter if your brain is full of meditation on, effecting dispensation and your stomach with medicine pills and tonics. Just let one of those cheery little women talk to you and we are not afraid to wager anything that she can cure you. The long drawn lines about the mouth will relax, the clouds of settled gloom will vanish we know not where. And the first you know you will be laughing. Ah what a blessing are these cheerful women how often her little hands guide the ponderous machine of life, with an almost invisible touch; how we look forward through the weary day to their fireside smiles. No one ever will know how much we own to these helpful, uncomplaining, cheerful women. A. B. P.

Beethoven Quartette's Concert.

Thursday evening last a large audience assembled in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on which occasion the far-famed Beethoven Quartette—composed of Messrs. Chas. Kelly and Sims Richards and Misses Hattie Morell and Ethel Woods, aided by Mr. Jim Fax—gave one of their justly celebrated entertainments. The quartettes, duets and solos—humorous and otherwise— were faultlessly rendered, and elicited an almost continual storm of applause; while the inimitable Fax created roars of laughter and, to use a rather stereotyped phrase, "fairly brought down the house." It was generally conceded that this was the best concert ever given in Flesherton, and the members of the Orange Lodge here—under whose auspices it was held—have very deservedly come in for a large share of praise for their enterprise in bringing such a magnificent array of talent to the town.

Fourth Line Orange Soiree.

The Orange Soiree held in the "4th line" lodge room on Friday evening last was a decided success. The attendance was excellent, the proceeds amounting to $22. The edibles, as usual, were of the very best, and for the production of which this neighborhood enjoys a very high reputation. The program seemed to put everyone in good humor, although the absence of a number of speakers, who had promised to attend, rendered it necessary to prepare a part of the "intellectual feast" on short notice. The chair was taken by the Editor of THE ADVANCE. Excellent instrumental music was furnished by the popular Pedlar Bros., and a number of laughable dialogues by Messrs. Pedlar and Williams were rendered. Mr. David Smith sang a number of well selected pieces in a very agreeable manner. Several bright little girls sang a number of pieces very creditably. Mr. John McKee, jr. and wife gave a number of readings and dialogues and rendered them well, too. Mr. Joseph Pedlar and Mr. Stafford, jr., gave sensible and practical addresses. Master Wm. Connor recited well. Altogether the program proved interesting and enjoyable.

CHAMBERLAIN ON HIS MISSION.

Eloquent Address Before the New York Canadian Club.

AN EQUITABLE AGREEMENT.

Importance of Amicable Relations Between Britain and the States.

A New York despatch says: The Canadian Club entertained the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain at dinner to-night at the Hotel Brunswick, and the occasion was worthy of its guest and of itself. Three hundred men were present, and the guest of the evening was welcomed by Mr. Erastus Wiman. The speaking was begun by Mr. Erastus Wiman, who, in a brief and pointed way, deprecated the fact that the peaceful relations of great nations should have been endangered by what he humorously alluded to as a "kettle of fish," and praised the commission for its excellent solution of the problem and the restoration of good feeling. Mr. Wiman introduced the guest of the evening, Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, who amid great applause rose and responded as follows to the toast of "Our English Guest:"

Mr. Chamberlain's Speech.

Mr President and Gentleman,—On behalf of my English colleagues and of myself I thank you sincerely for the cordiality of your reception. It is a great pleasure to be, at the termination of my mission to America, permitted to enjoy the hospitality of the Canadian Club which was tendered to me almost on my arrival. In the interval which has elapsed I have seen and heard and learned a great deal which has been of the deepest interest to me, and which cannot fail, I think, to be profitable to me in the future, and I am glad to say that the greater knowledge I have acquired of this country has only confirmed and strengthened the favorable and kindly feelings with which I have always regarded the affairs and the people of America. It would have been very strange had it been otherwise, for during my stay here I have received from everybody with whom I have been brought into contact personal kindness, encouraging hospitality and generous consideration, which have left behind a sentiment of overwhelming gratitude and goodwill. (Applause.) Mr. President, in your opening remarks you have alluded with some fullness to which brought me to this country. You are aware of the object which we had in view and, as you have said, this gathering has special interest in it. I do not suppose that either in Canada or in the United States of America there is any partisan so bitter and so absurd as to dispute the importance of good relations between Great Britain and the United States, and especially between the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada. For thousands of miles an invisible frontier line separates the domains of the greatest of England's colonies from the vast territories of the United States. In spite of everything that political science or political ignorance can do to erect barriers between nations, the social and commercial intercourse between the two countries is great and is continually extending. The railway systems are so interlocked that any disturbance of the existing relations would constitute something approaching a disaster and might imperil hundreds of millions of capital that is now invested in these great enterprises. And yet, gentlemen, some time ago there were, and possibly even now there are, men who contemplate without anxiety such a disturbance as that which I have suggested, and would look forward with a light heart to the end of which, the result of which, no man can foresee. And this is by no means the worst thing that might happen if a satisfactory and friendly agreement is now to be deemed to be impossible. A question which arouses national sentiment is not a question to be trifled with. The worst wars that have disgraced humanity have proceeded from trifling causes, and nations are very often more apt to resent petty affronts and injuries than they are a serious invasion of national rights. Now, gentlemen, I will venture with some knowledge of the subject to say to you that there has been no surrender at all on either side of anything which national honor and national interests demanded that we should retain. (Hear, hear, and applause.) I will say that in this treaty both sides have substantially gained what they contended for, and that the only concessions that have been made are the concessions which honorable men would gladly tender when they are endeavoring to settle a difference between friends and are not endeavoring to gain an unfair advantage over opponents. Now, if you will bear with me, I should like to take this opportunity of saying a few words as to the principal provisions of this alleged capitulation. And at the outset I want to call your attention to this very important fact. I have alluded to the irritation which was caused by the action of the Canadian Government in 1886 and 1887. We have gone to the roots of that irritation, we have removed its causes, and I can tell you that if this treaty had been in operation in the beginning of 1886, of all those cases of interference with American fishing vessels, there would not have been six. I don't believe there would have been two. Now that is at least an important fact to bear in mind when you are told, as you have been told, that we have settled nothing and that Canada has conceded nothing in order to secure friendly relations with the United States of America. On the contrary, I say that in this matter Canada has conceded everything that the claims of humanity, the claims of international courtesy or the comity of nations can possibly demand, and at the same time Canada has maintained, as she was bound to maintain, the vital and essential interests of her citizens. I don't believe that there is any international jurist of the slightest reputation who would deny that to refuse the great majority of the concessions that have been made in this treaty. At the present moment the relations between the two countries with regard to the fishery operations are regulated by the treaty—the Convention of 1818. That we have gone back to a treaty that was made years ago is not the fault of Canada, it is not the fault of Great Britain, it is the act of the United States of America, the Government of which country denounced successively the substitutes for the Convention of 1818, which had been arranged, in the shape of the treaty of 1854 and the subsequent treaty of 1871. By the action of the United States of America the condition of affairs was relegated back to the treaty of 1818. That treaty of 1818 declares in express terms that the fishing vessels of the United States shall have access to the ports and harbors of Canada for four purposes, for wood, water, shelter and repairs, and for no other purpose whatever. It is impossible that language should be plainer, and yet at the present moment you find that the opponents of the present treaty ignore altogether the treaty for which this is a substitute, and they try to construe the words of the Convention of 1818, "for no other purpose whatever," as if they were "for any other purpose whatever," and, gentlemen, although, as I have said, the legal rights of Canada in this matter

A COMMERCIAL WAR,

CANADA HAD THE LEGAL RIGHT

WERE UNASSAILABLE,

I have never concealed my opinion, and I state it here to-night, that it was only good policy on the part of Canada, it was only what good neighborhood demanded of Canada, that she should not interpret these legal rights in their strictest sense, but that they should concede to a friendly nation all the conveniences and all the privileges that they could possibly accord without serious injury to their own subjects. Canada declines, and always has declined, to allow her ports and harbors—which Providence has placed in close proximity to the great fisheries of the banks—to allow these ports and harbors to be made a base of operations for competitors who rigidly exclude her from their markets. These facilities are offered freely in return for an equivalent, and as long as the equivalent is denied Canada feels justified in declining to share these facilities which are essential to the conduct of the fishery operations. Everything, as I have said, which the comity of nations, or the courtesy of nations, or the convenience of fishermen can require has been and will be freely accorded by the Canadian Government under the treaty which we have just made.

We have settled another matter which has been since this Convention of 1818. We have delimited the exclusive fishery waters of Canada. You are aware that it has been the contention of the Dominion supporters by high legal authority that under that treaty the fishermen of the United States were debarred from fishing within three miles of any of the bays or harbors of Canada. On the other hand, the United States have contended that they were entitled to fish anywhere within three miles of the shore, whether in bays or outside of them. We have settled the difficulty by what may be called a compromise, but at any rate by an arrangement which is in accordance with the latest international law. We have settled it substantially in agreement with the principles of the North Sea Convention, the latest instrument of the kind in European diplomacy, and we have settled it in a way that I firmly believe will be satisfactory to every reasonable and fair-minded man. I have seen it objected to that certain land-locked bays of Chaleur and Miramichi have been excluded. Of course they have been excluded, because these bays come by nature under the exclusive territorial jurisdiction of Canada. I should like any American who may be present here to-night to say how he would like to apply the ten-mile limit or three-mile limit to the shores of the United States of America without taking care to exclude such bays as the Delaware Bay or the Chesapeake Bay or the other small estuaries or bays on the coast of the United States. Under the treaty as it stands there are only three things which are denied to the fishermen of the United States in Canadian waters. In the first place they are not allowed to fish in the territorial waters of Canada. They have told us again and again by the mouths of their leading representatives that this privilege has no longer any value for them; that they repudiate any desire to acquire it; that they believe it is worth nothing; and that certainly they are unwilling to pay anything for it. We take them at their word. They will not have the privilege, and they will not be required to pay anything. The other two privileges from which they are still excluded is the privilege of obtaining supplies for the prosecution of the fishing industry, the shipping of crews and the transhipment of their catch. Now, gentlemen, is it fair that these privileges, which are part of the commercial privileges of Canada, should be conferred on American fishermen without any equivalent of any kind? And is it any reason that two great countries should be kept in hot water because the gentlemen decline to pay anything for privileges from which they are expressly excluded by a similar treaty which they have obtained on a previous occasion by very large concessions on their part, which at the present time they declare to be worth nothing to themselves or to anybody else? Even these things they

ONE OF CONSTANT CONTROVERSY

CAN HAVE AT ANY MOMENT.

They can have them in the first place at any time when the Congress of the United States may see fit to give the consumers of the United States a cheaper and a more abundant supply of fish—(laughter and applause)—and even if the Congress of the United States, in its wisdom, should deem that to be undesirable, the fishermen can still have these privileges for the limited period of two years under what is known as modus vivendi. I would venture to point out to you that it is a proposal which is freely offered by Canada as a great and additional concession—a proof of friendship and good will, which Canada will be only too happy to withdraw if it is not accepted in the same spirit. There is nothing in this proposal which is compulsory. If the fishermen think that the advantages offered are not worth the price demanded, which we think to be altogether insignificant, if they think so they are not bound to avail themselves of it, and as far as they are concerned the proposal may be a dead letter. I can quite understand that the people of Canada may think the plenipotentiaries that they have gone out of their way in making this offer, but our feeling was that since fishing operations were about to begin we were bound to do all in our power to tide over the difficulty and to discover a way to avoid a litigation that otherwise might be caused by the persistent refusal of these privileges; but, as I have said, if the offer is misunderstood or undervalued by those for whose benefit it is intended, nothing will be easier than to secure its absolute and unconditional withdrawal. The plenipotentiaries on both sides were animated by a feeling of anxiety as to future possibilities if an agreement were not arrived at, animated also by a strong desire to draw closer the ties between the two greatest nations of the earth, England and America, They prepared and submitted this agreement. The responsibility now rests upon other shoulders. It rests in the first place, no doubt, upon the people of the United States, a country where public opinion is all-powerful. It rests upon the Senate of the United States, upon that great legislative and executive body which in the past history of the country has played so distinguished a role, and for my part I cannot bring myself to doubt that they will rise to the importance of this great occasion, that they will not suffer party interest to influence them in a matter of international welfare, and that they will do all in their power to aid our efforts in promoting a concord upon which the peace and well-being of the world may depend. I trust that they will remember the words of General Grant, written by him when he was almost on his death-bed, and which may be considered, therefore, as his last legacy to the American people. At the closing chapter of his memoirs he says: "England and the United States of America are natural allies and ought always to be the best of friends." That great warrior, who had fought more battles and won more victories than any man in history, did not look upon war with the complacency with which it is regarded by irresponsible politicians and editors of newspapers. General Grant thought he saw the best guarantee for peace in the friendship which he deemed it his duty to promote. That friendship, believe me, is important to the interests of both our nations. It is dictated by our common origin—(hear, hear)—by the ties of blood and of history, by our traditions, and, gentlemen, I believe there is no higher ambition for a statesman in either country than to have contributed in the slightest degree to draw closer and tighter the bonds of comity which should always unite all the branches of the English speaking peoples.

The conclusion of Mr. Chamberlain's speech was greeted by a most enthusiastic burst of applause and long and vociferous cheering.

PANAMA CANAL.

Meeting of the Company in Paris—M. de Lesseps Confident of the Completion of the Canal, but Postpones the Date.

A Paris cable says: M. de Lesseps, in his report to the extra meeting of the Panama Canal Company to-day, stated that the ill-will of opponents of the canal, which resulted in compelling the company to borrow money at a higher rate of interest than was expected, is the only cause of the increased cost and of the intimidation of certain of the company's contractors. Referring to the number of cubic metres excavated in 1887, the report states that owing to the prevalence of the rainy season, and the difficulty in procuring workmen, M. de Lesseps can hardly ensure completion of the canal in 1889. The directors have been induced to agree to the construction of locks, by means of which vessels of the largest tonnage may traverse the canal in 1890, before the work is absolutely completed. The financial statement shows that 110,000,000f. were on hand on January 1st, 1888. Pending the decision of the Government regarding the lottery loan, it has been decided to proceed with a third issue of bonds of 1,000f. to the value of 6,000,000f., the repayment of which will be provided for by the creation of a guarantee fund invested in rentes. In conclusion M. de Lesseps expresses his absolute confidence in the completion of the canal. The meeting unanimously adopted M. de Lesseps' report.

Queer Charge of Smuggling.

A Lockport, N.Y., despatch says: A New York man was detected by two Suspension Bridge Custom Inspectors at that place last night coming over from Canada on the Grand Trunk train, trying to smuggle gold watchcases, studded with diamonds. He was arrested and taken to Lockport, where he was committed for trial. Combremont represents the Dubois Watch-Case Company, of Brooklyn, and is a fine-looking, well dressed man. He asserts that the watch-cases were his samples, that he took them over to Canada as such, and should not be accused of smuggling for bringing them back.

PRINCE WILLIAM.

The Future Emperor of Germany—His Advancement to a Major-Generalship—How He Looks and Acts.

A Berlin cable says: Prince William, the eldest son of the Crown Prince and future heir to the German throne, received the title of Major-General as a birthday present from the Emperor on January 27th. The advanced age of the monarch and the frail condition of the Crown Prince's health have certainly had much to do with the grandson's rapid promotion. Two years ago—he is now 29—Prince William ranked only as a major, and people in general looked with surprise at the slowness with which he advanced, yet all praised the thoroughness of his military education. Innumerable princelings were then above him, as well as untitled men of not much longer service, for a Prussian prince receives his straps at the age of 10. He was compelled to work like the rest of his comrades, equally subject to military discipline. Early and late he was with his regiment, ordered about as an ordinary major, saluting his superiors, with little or no attention—in a military way—paid to his royal rank. But all this is changed, and he wears now the brilliant insignia of a Prussian major-general. The Emperor appointed him by telegraph, he being stationed at Potsdam, and a few hours later he presented himself to his grandsire in his new regimentals, beamingly happy at his increased importance. Any hour may make him crown prince—yes, may make him king and emperor—and the proud old ruler has at last thought it best to recognize this possibility, and prepare the young man for its realization.

Yet Prince William is a young-looking Major-General. He lacks the prominent, rugged features of his father and the handsome lines of his grandsire. The Hohenzollerns have no hereditary physical characteristics. Even Prof. Virchow failed to find any cranial ones in his scientific examination of the ancestral skulls. They have never intermarried, having the purest blood of all royal families, a custom which tends to preserve and intensify peculiarities. Prince William has the appearance of a young man of 25. His upper lip shows a sparse blonde moustache, his nose is slightly Roman, with a medium forehead, and his hair stands back like Beethoven's. But, despite the comparatively weak chin, his cold blue eye has a brave, daring expression which reminds one a little of the great Frederick, whom he is fondly said to resemble in character. He is slender in build and shorter in stature than his brother, the "naval Hohenzollern." His right hand is badly crippled and his right arm at least two inches shorter than his left—a defect which has caused as much annoyance and mental pain as ever Byron's deformity did. He tries upon every occasion to conceal it, but tries, of course, in vain. Yet the skill he possesses is remarkable. He carries his sword upon parade as well as any officer, and has become a most excellent fencer, rides like a Cossack and shoots with unerring aim. No officer in the army is more popular than this royal scion, and none is more clever. No wonder that his men are attached to him. He has a pleasant word for all, and cracks his joke with the common man as though he were of his number. His training has been very democratic. He attended school at Cassel, boarding with one of the teachers, and treated exactly as one of the other boys. Taking his lunch one day, he noticed one of his comrades eating the black bread which the poorer classes use in Germany. Wishing to taste it, he offered to "trade" with the boy—the son, I believe, of a poor mechanic—who, of couse, was only too glad to do so. It pleased the Prince's palate so much that he made an agreement to exchange lunches with the boy every day, and thenceforward he always feasted upon the black bread baked in the house of the mechanic. He was graduated after several years at Cassel among the first in his class, to the great satisfaction of his parents, who attended the commencement. He afterward—as is the Hohenzollern custom—attended the university at Bonn, and joined the famous Saxo-Borussen corps, over whose annual meetings he presides, and is as eager as any in relating the pranks of his student days, and to-day one meets him in the streets of Berlin in civilian's clothes mingling with the people like the "citizen king." The malady and suffering of the Crown Prince in the far-off Italian town have roused the sympathies of the whole population; but despite his popularity, despite the way they love him, it is safe to say the majority of the nation spend more enthusiasm upon his son, look upon Prince William as the wearer of the mantle of Frederick the Great, and believe him destined to fulfil the cherished hopes of Germany, further the plans of a Bismarck and Moltke, and cement the union of the fatherland.

The Kilt in the House of Lords.

A London correspondent writes: The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, who moved the Address, rather electrified their lordships and the rest of his audience (who are not used to such things) by appearing in Highland costume. Now, had it been Mr. William O'Brien appearing thus attired in the House of Commons, men's minds might have been somewhat prepared and the shock would not have been so great. But Lord Crawford in a kilt certainly proved a startling apparition in the House of Peers. He moved the Address in a neat and thoughtful little speech, and then gave way to the seconder, Lord Armstrong, who wore the familiar Windsor uniform, which was calming and reassuring beside the strange attire of Lord Crawford.

Under His Wife's Hoops.

Henry IV., at that time King of Navarre, heard that the assassins were in search of him. With his admirable presence of mind he told his wife, Queen Margaret, to sit down and concealed himself under her hoops, so that when the cut-throats burst into the apartment she could tell them with the most natural air in the world: "The bird that you are trying to catch has just flown out of the window." Whereupon they shrunk away, whilst their intended victim laughed in his wife's petticoats.

RARE PRESENCE OF MIND.

A Display of that Quality by a Young Woman Under Most Trying Circumstances.

A Leavenworth, Kan., despatch says: Miss Nellie, daughter of Hon. P. G. Lowe, of this city, was visiting the Misses Marsh at their home in Dyington Park, Kansas City, last week. One evening the family were up beyond the regular hour of retiring. Miss Lowe had for a room-mate one of the young ladies she was visiting, and while preparing for a night's rest she had a premonition that all was not right, and expressed herself as feeling as if there was an unseen person in the room. Her fears were laughed at; but so firmly had the conviction become impressed upon her mind that she placed a few matches on a chair at the head of the bed, to be used in case of an emergency. But sleep soon drove away all fears, and for a number of hours their slumbers were not disturbed, when from some unknown cause Miss Lowe was suddenly awakened, feeling that there was another occupant of the room, and that, whatever or whoever it was, it was steadily gazing at her face. She was so sure of this that she did not dare open her eyes for a minute or two. When she did, it was to see the form of a big negro crouching oeside her trunk, which was but a few feet from where she was lying. In a flash her plan of operations filled her mind. Securing the hand of her sleeping companion, she gently pressed until the latter was awakened, and in a smothered whisper asked Miss Marsh if she could not hear a noise. The stealthy steps of the burglar were plainly heard, and Miss Lowe, telling her companion not to move, remarked loud enough for the robber to hear that her throat was very sore, and said, "Won't you go with me to the bath-room for a drink of water?" but added, almost in the same breath, "Never mind, I will go myself." Suiting her actions to the words, she leisurely arose from bed, picked up a match, and walking to the door opened it and stepped out into the hall. Miss Marsh, not knowing what had taken place, as the room was in almost total darkness, sat up in bed, and seeing the negro still beside the trunk, but standing erect, screamed. At this juncture Miss Lowe lighted a match and also screamed, and the would be robber dashed to the window and, springing to a ladder that he had in readiness there, swiftly slid to the ground and dashed away in the darkness. The continued screams of the young ladies aroused the household, but there was nothing to be seen but the open window through which the intruder had made his exit. Nothing had been disturbed, and it was evident that he had been in the room but a few minutes before being discovered by Miss Lowe.

RAPE OF THE LOCK.

A Man Chloroforms a Servant Girl in Daylight, Cuts off Her Hair, and Carries it off.

A Davenport, Iowa, despatch says: Employed at the residence of Ira L Gifford, on Brady street, is a girl named Maggie Jensen, aged 13 years—strong for one of her age. Her parents live in West Davenport. Shortly after 3 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, the girl says, a man rapped at the front door. She hastened to the door and opened it partly. "Does Mr. Gifford live here?" "Yes, sir." "Is he at home?" "No, sir." "I will leave this note for him." The man took a pencil and piece of paper from his vest-pocket and commenced writing against the door-casing. He extended the paper toward the girl, and that is the last of her recollection of the stranger. When she came to her senses between 4 and 5 o'clock she found herself on the floor in a bed-room at the end of the hall, with her hair severed close to the back of her head. There was a strong odor of chloroform in the room. On the floor and on a dressing case were several clippings of hair.

What object the man could have in securing the girl's hair is a query. It is what is known as "sandy" hair—neither red nor auburn—and was not more than seven or eight inches in length. The girl was not assaulted in any other way than that stated. She has been closely questioned by Chief Kessler and other members of the police, and by several persons, but she tells the same straight story every time.

Preparing to Escape.

One of the prisoners named Davis, aged 24, in the Portsmouth convict prison, who had just commenced his second term of five years' penal servitude, was having his cell searched, when it was found that he had only one sheet in his bed. He was examined, and it was ascertained that he had converted one sheet into a perfectly fitting suit of clothes, a cap being made of the some material, and he was wearing this under his ordinary prison garb. A letter was found on him, addressed to a resident in Portsmouth, appealing for money.—Pal Mall Gazette.

Their Third Set of Triplets.

A Texarkana, Tex., despatch says: The wife of James McElmore, living at this place, has given birth to triplets, two boys and a girl. The McElmore neighborhood is indifferent to an immigration movement.

THE Imperial crown of all the Russias is the finest ever worn by a sovereign. It is in the form of a Bishop's mitre and carries on its crest a cross composed of five of the most beautiful diamonds ever cut supporting the largest ruby in the world. Eleven great diamonds in a foliated arch rising from the front and back of the crown support this cross and ruby, and on either side is a hoop of thirty-eight pearls, than which there are no handsomer known.

RECENTLY, in Lambeth Palace, the Archbishop of Canterbury received a deputation from the Coptic and Abyssinian Churches. The Coptic and Abyssinian Churches are really not two, but one. The Copts are the descendants of the ancient Egyptians and the Coptic is the native Christian Church of Egypt. The Coptic Patriarch, who takes his title from Alexandria, but who resides at Cairo and who is regarded as the successor of St. Mark, is at the head of the Coptic and Abyssinian Christians.

THE extra expense of warming the outer pure air in cold weather, remarks the Canada Health Journal, as it comes into rooms is with many people an obstacle to ventilation. But these same people often think little of the extra cost of some of the higher priced foods with which to gratify their palate, when often they would be better with simpler, less expensive food. "Simpler food and purer air" might well be put up as a motto on their wall. It should be put up everywhere in the mind of men and of women too, in indelible letters, that the very last essential of life in which anyone should attempt to economize, should be the outer pure air. Expenses may be cut down in every other necessary much more safely, remember, and with less disadvantage than in this one.

THIS is an age of stupendous schemes and the railway comes in for its due share Prominent among these, in so far at least as the features of daring and magnitude are concerned, is the proposal to build a line of railway to connect Minneapolis and St. Paul with Pekin, China, and Irkutsk, Russia, via Victoria, B.C., and Cape Prince of Wales, Behring Strait, involving among other astonishing things the bridging of Behring Strait, which at the point suggested in this scheme is only thirty-five miles wide and from 20 to 25 fathoms deep. The distance from Victoria to Cape Prince of Wales is about 1,100 miles. It is not stated who the moving spirits in this stupendous enterprise are further than that they are western men, which leaves no doubt that in the matter of enterprise and daring at least there will be nothing lacking.

IN a speech delivered recently in London Dr. Edward White said in regard to mental bondage: "We were the slaves of writings, institutions and ancient words and phrases. We needed freedom to consult the divine oracles and revelations. Such freedom would end in the diminution of the authority of priests and Parliament, but would increase the individual freedom of men and tend to the greater glory of the Christian religion." A religious contemporary asks who or what stands in Dr. White's way, and suggests that this cry for liberty, when every man has it if he will only take it, is degenerating into mere babble. If a man cannot find the liberty he wants in one denomination he can try another. If he cannot find it in any he can stand alone. There is really now no longer any intellectual religious bondage except such as is self-elected.

"THE decay of old religious animosities is indicated," thinks the Christian Union, "by the modern Protestant attitude toward the Roman Catholic Church. The Pope's jubilee, with the numerous expressions of good will from Protestant sources, is a sign. One may hold Protestant convictions as resolutely as his fathers held them, and may oppose the Catholic propaganda in Church and State with the greatest zeal and earnestness, and still preserve toward this Church that attitude of Christian courtesy which ought to be, although it never yet has been, the characteristic of Christian peoples. It is not impossible that the time may come when the old antagonism of the Catholic and the Protestant may appear insignificant in view of the deeper antagonisms which shall make them essentially one. Thomas Carlyle declared that the real struggle in every age is between the believer and the unbeliever, and it has seemed at times of late as if this phrase might soon describe the practical issue of certain tendencies in modern society. For anarchism and social disorder of the radical kind have their roots in atheism, and it is quite possible that the time may come when the real issue will be between the theist and atheist; the man who believes in God and order and freedom and rights of person and property on the one side, and the man who disbelieves in all these on the other side. Whenever that time comes the Protestant and the Catholic will stand side by side in a common defence of those common beliefs which have been their possession these many centuries."

The Persian Barber.

In Persia the barber is quite an important man; his profession does not stop at shaving chins and heads, but includes both surgery and dentistry; just as it used to do in England before Queen Elizabeth's time. His shop is a stall-like place, with an open front and a brick floor. In the centre of the floor is a little tank of water, or perhaps a miniature flower garden. A breast-high recess in the thick wall is the receptacle for the miscellaneous tools and implements of the barber's triple profession. The razors are set straight and stiff in the handles like table-knives. Several of these, scissors, combs and a little hand-mirror complete his barbering tools; but side by side with them are fleams and lancets for blood-letting, branding-irons for actual cautery, and a pair of rude iron pincers for pulling teeth. The Persian barber's customers sit cross-legged on the floor, or more often, in fine weather, outside the shop, in the street. To get shaved, with a Persian, is to have, not merely the face shaved, but the entire head, save for a little tuft on top or one on each side. Not every Persian shaves his beard, but he always gets his head shaved. In the case of boys the tuft on top of the head is allowed to grow long, the idea being that in case of death Mahommed will have something to lift them into paradise by. Old men with flowing beards think their whiskers provide this needful hand-hold and so have their scalps quite clean. Young men and beaux have a little tuft, termed the ryulf, or love-lock, left on each side to grow long and dangle behind the ear.

Beefsteak and Black Eyes

There is a world-wide superstition that as soon as a man gets a black eye he must use cold application for hours, and that the best cold application possible is raw beef. I call it a superstition because it is without reason and against reason. Everybody knows that what makes a discoloration of the skin by a bruise is the congestion of the part with the blood that cannot get away again, so that it decomposes and changes its color; and everybody ought to know that the way to prevent such a result is to facilitate and stimulate the circulation in the bruised part. A cold application retards the circulation, and the best thing is to stimulate it by hot applications. Twice in my life I was threatened with a black eye. On the first occasion I applied raw beef and other cold applications, and succeeded in producing the blackest eye you ever saw. On the second occasion I got some hot water right away and bathed the eye for about half an hour in it. The result was that there was not the slightest discoloration at any time.—Chicago Journal

An Arab's Reply.

While exploring the ruins of Nineveh Layard wrote to a Turkish cadi: "O cadi Can you inform me what is the size of the village; how many are its people, and by what industries do they live?" The Turk answered: "O effendi! Joy of my liver! The thing you want to know is difficult to find out and useless. I have never counted the houses nor numbered the men, and as to what this man loads on his camel or that man hides in his tent is no concern of mine. Oh my soul's light! Joy of my liver! Shall we say behold this star spinneth about that star? Let it spin. Or shall we say, Lo, that star with a tail cometh and goeth in so many days! Let it go! Amen."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Quite a scare has been created at the Chicago Bridewell, where 950 prisoners are confined, over a discovery of a case of smallpox yesterday. The victim is a man who came here from the East a few days ago and was sent out for vagrancy. He was promptly removed to the pest-house, and on Saturday 600 of the prisoners were vaccinated. The remainder will be treated to-day.

LATEST FASHION NOTES.

Novelties for Spring and Summer Wear.

All the young debutante blondes wear bonnets o poppy-red tulle for calling and afternoon teas.

Some of the elaborate French gloves are embroidered on the backs with gold or silver thread in designs of fleur-de-lis and sometimes with the monogram of the wearer.

On the new bonnets all the trimmings are lowered, though they are by no means flat. But the towering pointed bows of last year have given place to soft, wide loops, put on to give a broader effect. Very thick aigrettes will be used again, and these as high as ever, but too fine and light to be objectionable.

For evening wear in the way of wraps the plush long coat is giving place to one of red cloth, or preferably of poppy-colored cashmere. If of the latter it is made with a number of little tucks both back and front, which descend to the waist and there open to form part of the fulness in the very full skirts. They are lined throughout with sicilienne of the same shade and have sleeves opening very wide at the wrist.

A pretty walking dress is made of bright golden brown ladies' cloth, with a very high finish. The skirt is edged with a little cording of sealskin, above it being many folds of the material in pinked scallops. The long curtain draperies are corded with the sealskin, as are the edges of the vest, which is composed of rows of the pinked materials. A pretty little cloth and sealskin toque and a sealskin cape complete the costume.

Corsages with full fronts are in great favor for dresses of various materials, from heavy silks to the thinnest gauzes. The amateur dressmaker will find that this fulness is easily added, and that it will improve the simplest bodice. For cotton fabrics and also for silks it is only necessary to add two or three inches of greater breadth to the fronts, gathering this fulness at the throat and at the waist line. In wash dresses the darts are not taken up on the outside, but only in the lining; in silks, however, the darts are sewed in both.

Double-breasted corsages are becoming too long for slender figures, as they have the effect of making them appear shorter in the waist. Irregular arrangements are preferred for double-breasted bodices, such as lapping the right side nearly to the left arm-hole, then turning over the top to form a triangular reverse and sloping the space below back to the middle of the waist line. Another fancy has the doubled parts only below the darts, while the upper part has a gathered plastron of silk or lace edged by a collar of moir or velvet, which also crosses with the lower part to the left side, where it is buttoned.

For waists that are too short braces or bretelles of ribbon are used to give an appearance of greater length. Two inch ribbons are folded narrowly to a point just beside the buttons, and are gradually widened until they reach to the collar, or else the shoulder-seams next the collar, when they again pass down the back, forming a point at the waist line. Narrow, long vests and slender revers are also becoming to those short waists. Diamond-shaped revers rolled over next a narrow vest are in great favor at present; each revers represents half an elongated diamond, and may be made of velvet, while the vest is of moire, or may be covered with gilt beading or galloon or with lace, and the revers be made of moire.

To make a pretty V shaped opening in a dress high on the shoulders, the straight edges of the fronts of the dress goods are carried back to the shoulder seams and the fulness is gathered along these seams. Pretty lapped corsages have the fulness carried still further back on the shoulder-seams, and a fabric of contrasting color (such as surah, tulle or Brussels net) partly fills in the pointed throat, passing around the neck and being carried in folds down the front, lapping to the left side at the waist line and finished there with a rosette or flowing bow of ribbon. For instance, a dress of suede-colored bengaline has pale blue China crape folds in the neck; and another of gray veiling striped with poppy-red has bright red surah folds with inside olds of red tulle next the open throat.

All the shop windows are now filled with the spring goods. A pretty satine is of a light shade of old blue, with polka dots of a darker shade and irregular sizes strewn over it in such a manner as to give the effect of stripes. Pale gray blue veilings are shown in combination with heavy cream white canvas, with widely separated double stripes of the blue grey in bourette. All shades of green are popular in the new satines and summer silks; the figures are rather large, and are copied from natural objects, such as leaves, flowers and fruit, rather than the conventional designs that were in favor last season. Nearly all the veilings and cashmeres, chaillies and bengalines are made in combinations, most of them having skirt and waistcoat of dull white, striped with the color from which the draperies and bodice are made.

A White Robin.

On Thursday morning Mr. H. W. Barret, telegraph operator at Maiden's Adventure, Va., was sitting in his office, and, to his astonishment, he saw a white robin perch itself on a tree near by. He called the attention of several parties to it, but they said it could not be a robin. Mr. Hicks, who was present, shot the bird, and it proved to be a robin, entirely white, with the exception of a small brick-dust spot under the breast.—Richmond (Va. State.

A Tarantula's Savage Attack.

A Kansas City despatch says: Mrs. Johnson, who keeps a small fruit store on Independence avenue, was moving a bunch of bananas this morning when a large tarantula jumped out and made a savage attack upon her, but inflicted no wound. It then jumped to the floor, where a cat attacked it and received a bite, from which it soon died. The insect's body was over an inch in diameter.

The Grand Old Man and Mrs. Gladstone will celebrate their golden wedding (D. V.) in July next.

SHUT YOUR MOUTH.

The Origin of Many Chest and Throat Diseases.

Some of us who have attained to the dignity of middle age may remember the time when George Catlin, the famous American traveller, startled nervous people by solemnly warning them of the dangers of opening their mouths. Carlyle, whose mouth by the way, when he had anybody to listen to him, was certainly "open" to a very considerable extent, had emphatically uttered a similar warning; but, whereas his words had reference only to the flow of talk, Mr. Catlin was exclusively concerned with the inhalation of breath, which he firmly maintained ought as far as possible to be performed by the nostrils. The memory of the eccentric little book, with its odd pictorial devices, entitled "The Breath of Life," wherein these views were propounded, is just now revived by Dr. Abbotts in a new monthly magazine devoted to the subject of health. Dr. Abbotts was a personal friend of Catlin, and, moreover, assisted him in writing the little book referred to. Catlin it was who said: "If I were to endeavor to bequeath to posterity the most important motto which the human language can convey, it would be in three words—Shut your mouth." Since then this advice has become one of the commonplaces of popular physiology. Catlin spent great part of his life among the North American Indians, sojourned with them, practiced their customs and mode of life, until he became as one of themselves. He went among them in the hope of improving his health by travel, for he was suffering from consumption. Having observed that this insidious disease and indeed all chest and throat affections were very rare with the Indian tribes he inqured into the cause, got a useful "wrinkle," as folk say, profited by it and was troubled with weak lungs no more. So careful, we are told, are the Indians in this respect that the women are very particular in inculcating among their children from infancy the habit of keeping the mouth shut. How many a civilized white father would at times be glad to "inculcate" in the same direction! After lowering the baby from the breast they carefully press its lips together before it falls asleep, and we are told that the habit it thus early acquired becomes permanent. One of the most eminent of the popular expounders of scientific truth in the present day is credited with saying that: "Man is the only creature that can breathe through the mouth and he is a fool when he does so." Dr. Abbotts attributes to our ignorance and neglect of this truth a great proportion of our cases of sore throat, cough, bronchitis and chest disease. Caries of the teeth is also one of the evil consequences, while the injury done to the habitual expression of the features is sufficiently recognized by our contemptuous term, "a gaping idiot," and the French gobe mouche or "fly swallower." There seems little reason to doubt, says the London News, that chest and throat diseases, which often spring from the inhalation of irritating dust, as well as from damp and cold, would be much less frequent were Catlin's advice universally acted upon, and civilized mankind learned to breathe through the nostrils alone.

"A Word to the Wise is Sufficient."

Catarrh is not simply an inconvenience, unpleasant to the sufferer and disgusting to others it is an advanced outpost of approaching diseases of worst type. Do not neglect its warning; it brings deadly evils in its train. Before it is to o late, use Dr Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It reaches the seat of the ailment, and is the only thing that will. You may dose yourself with quack medicines till it is too late—'til the streamlet becomes a resistless torrent. It is the matured invention of a scientific physician "A word to the wise is sufficient."

How Monkeys Eat Oysters.

Alfred Carpenter, of the Marine Survey Office, Bombay, has observed Macacus monkeys on the island off South Burmah opening oysters with a stone. They bring the stones from high water mark down to low water, selecting such stones as they can easily grasp. They effect an opening by striking the base of the upper valve until it dislocates and breaks up. Then they extract the oyster with the finger and thumb, occasionally putting the mouth straight to the broken shell. The way they have chosen is the easiest to open the shell.—Philadelphia Evening Telegraph.

Many men of many minds
Many pills of various kinds.

But for a mild, effective, vegetable purgative, you had better get Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. They cure sick headache, bilious headache, dizziness, constipation, indigestion and bilious attack; 25 cents a vial, by druggists.

Maiden Inexperience.

Kittie—Oh, Fannie, Joe proposed to me last night. Fannie—No, you don't say? Did he do it nicely? Kittie—Yes—no—I don't know. I'm no expert.—Washington (D.C.) Critic.

Fair Evidence for Everybody.

No one can doubt the great merit of Polson's Nerviline, for it has been placed in the market in 10 cent bottles, just to give you the opportunity of testing its wonderful power over all kinds of pain. This is the best evidence of its efficiency, for every person can try for themselves. Polson's Nerviline is a positive (it cannot fail) cure for cramps, headache, colds, neuralgia and the host of pains that flesh is heir to. Good to take; good to rub on. Go to any drug store and buy a 10 cent sample bottle. Large bottles 25 cents.

He Meant Well.

A man, whose wife is away on a visit, wrote to her the other day and added this stanza, which he wrote in good spirit, but which is likely to raise a row:

If absence makes the heart grow fonder,
And distance makes the dear more dear.
I pray thee, do not cease to wander,
And stay away at least a year.

Cause for Singing.

Brown—That Jones is an insufferable bore.

Robinson—How do you make that out?

B.—Hear him singing "I've got $15 in my inside pocket."

R.—Why not? By Jove, if I had $15 in my inside pocket I would sing to.

A "Put and Call."

This is a funny phrase to the uninitiated, but all the brokers understand it. They use it when a person gives a certain per cent. for the option of buying or selling stock on a fixed day, at a price stated on the day the option is given. It is often a serious operation to the dealer, but there is a more serious "put and call" than this: when you are "put" to bed with a severe cold and your friends "call" a physician. Avoid all this by keeping in the house Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. The great cure for pulmonary and blood diseases. Its action is marvellous. It cures the worst cough, whether acute, lingering or chronic. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Short Breath, Consumption, Night-sweats and kindred affections, it surpasses all other medicines.

Tonsorial Item.

Barber—I think I have cut your hair evenly. Your head looks perfectly round.

Customer—It don't make any difference if my head ain't round; I'm not going to roll ninepins with it, anyhow.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Large bottles (100 doses) $1.00, or six bottles for $5.00.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Our contemporary, the Grey Review, is anxious to know what our opinion is now relative to the position taken by Conservative M. P's relative to Mr. Mills' amendment in the House of Commons recently, re the Scott Act. Well, we agree with Sir John McDonald, that the question should be considered aside from party politics altogether. It is purely a moral question, and to deal with it as it deserves, it is necessary to remove it from the arena of politics. Mr. Mills' motive in introducing the amendment was too transparent to mislead. He considered the exigencies of his party rather than the interests of Temperance people. It was quite a stroke of diplomacy on his part but he met with just such a rebuff as he merited.

These miserable subterfuges of politicians—whether emanating from the Reform or the Conservative benches—are calculated to produce a feeling of disgust in the adherents of both parties.

We suppose the Flesherton ADVANCE man will now spend the spring in trying to show that Dr. Sproule, who paired against the amendment, is a better temperance man than Dr. Landerkin, who voted for it," says the Review. THE ADVANCE man will do nothing of the kind. Dr. Sproule is one of the most consistent men who has ever sat in the House of Commons. Even his position on this tricky Mills' amendment is an evidence of his consistency; although it is possible he would still have voted with the Government if the amendment had been opposed to the Scott Act; simply because of the motive by which Mr. Mills was actuated in connection therewith. On the other hand, Dr. Landerkin was equally consistent, and would have been had the amendment been worded differently, viz., opposed to the Scott Act, and had he voted with his political friends as in the first instance. We admire consistency in politicians as in other men, and quite agree with the Review that there are too many men in the former class, who only "spout temperance" when it is suited to their party." Witness the recent political contest in South Grey and our M.P's vote on a former Scott Act amendment, in which an attempt was made to introduce the wine "and beer" clause, but which was defeated by those wicked Tories, whom the Review now professes to despise because they nipped Mr. Mills nice little trick in the bud.

The Thornbury Standard is one of the most spicy of our eastern exchanges. Its articles are original, forcible and pointed. Bro. Farewell is also a heavy hitter and he doesn't practice on a sand bag either same as our fighting editor. The Standard is fifteen years old, has gallantly survived a number of libel suits, and is now a sturdy and promising young man. It may be urged that we are biassed in favor of the Standard: the truth of the matter is, that the Standard has brains, and we always admired a newspaper possessing a goodly stock of that desirable article. Too many country papers are run by men who borrow, nay, steal, the productions of their more "brainy" contemporaries.

The Thornbury Standard says:—"Appleton Londry is the champion story teller of this section of the Province." Is that so? Why, we were actually under the impression that the editor of the Bruce Herald could down anything in this Province in that particular!

Some persons stole half a cord of wood from the editor of the Dundalk Herald recently. The men who would thus endanger their chances of getting inside the celestial city, must fear neither the Old Gentleman, who stirs up the fires of torment down below, nor the Dundalk penitentiary! The rascals well deserved the following certificate of character from the Herald:—"The beggars, thieves, scoundrels or whatever they be, only deserve our most scornful reproach for their blundering, disgraceful and unchristian conduct."

There must be some desperate characters around Dundalk. One man down there recently borrowed a bottle of gin and jalap from another man's overcoat pocket—forgetting to apprise the owner of the fact. The "borrower" treated a number of his friends to copious draughts from the bottle, not knowing that the latter was loaded and liable to go off without warning. It went off!

The Prince and Princess of Wales celebrated their Silver Wedding recently. We at first thought of sending our nickle-plated scissors as a gift, but were afraid Ned might discover the imposition and break the warm friendship now existing between us!

We believe there is no better centre in Simcoe, Grey or Bruce, for the establishment of a good foundry and machine shop, by some enterprising, go-ahead man, than Flesherton. The marvel to us is, that this fact has not been noticed before. Any pushing man with a fair amount of capital, ought to command the bulk of the trade in the three counties named.

Mr. S. J. Coleman writes a letter to the Markdale Standard, in which he maintains, that his statement, that the population of Markdale is "720 and not more," was correct; while the Editor is equally emphatic in declaring that "it is glaringly incorrect." The matter can easily be settled to the satisfaction of all concerned, viz., by appointing some neutral person to take the census of the place and make affidavit as to the correctness of the same.

But it is passing strange, that the gentlemen who favored the elevation of the late town of Markdale, actually put the population of that place in the neighborhood of one thousand! If Mr. Coleman's census is "glaringly incorrect," the town "boomers" statement is outrageously so. It would seem that in order to effect their purpose, the "boomers" grossly misrepresented the facts—whether wilfully or ignorantly, we do not presume to say.

In his clever and forcible letter to the Standard, re incorporation of Markdale, Mr. S. J. Coleman among other things gets off the following retort:—"Had you, or your confreres supposed you could confute my figures, why not have demanded a delay in proceedings by the Legislative Committee? It would have been only a few days delay; but, sir, you were afraid of scrutiny into the demerits of the document you presented to the Legislature, which set forth that the population of Markdale was in or about one thousand, and that the population was rapidly increasing, a statement not borne out by the facts: in short, every allegation in the petition for Incorporation was false and misleading, and, if the would-be fathers of Markdale resort to questionable methods in carrying the first point in the nursery stage of our infant municipality, the ratepayers may rationally ask, "what next?" The flagrant falsehood was widely disseminated by so-called persons of purity, in order to hoodwink the unsuspecting public. There are certain persons in this world whose cranky minds are never satisfied—even the most rigid truth fails to appease their suspicious souls; for, the advocates of incorporation three years ago, discredited the man they employed to take a census, because his figures did not tally with their desires."

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

You Carry

A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."

Here is an instance of

who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:

"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."

John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."

T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Causes for Defeat of Scott Act.

From Globe.

Milton, March 1.—To-day's result was a great surprise, not only to the supporters of the Act, but also to the Antis. The Rev. A. E. Russ, after the result was known, proposed the following reasons for the defeat:—First, the voters' list was prejudicial to the Act; second, the illegality of the petition, causing people to be less interested in the contest; third, the late Halton Dominion election alienated a large number of the supporters of the Act; fourth, probably less interest is taken in the Act at present, as there is an increased desire for general prohibition.

Sentiment Stronger than Ever.

Dufferin Advertiser.

The Temperance Sentiment in Halton has not weakened—it is stronger to day than ever it was. The vote does not show any revulsion of feeling on the temperance question. It merely shows that skilful interference aided by money supplied by brewers and distilleries may snatch a verdict quite contrary to the sentiments of the people.

A Streetsville View of it.

Streetsville Review.

This much is certain, the defeat in Halton is the severest blow yet dealt against the Scott Act in Ontario. It has been tried in the balance and has been found wanting, and the "banner county" is the banner county no longer. There is a growing sentiment in this country in favor of temperance, but no terrorism of the churches, no bastard legislation such as the Scott Act contains will ever bring the cause to full fruition. Other and better methods must be found, before the great object of temperance workers can be accomplished.

Bro. Townsends Opinion.

Grey Review.

Some temperance journals ascribe the cause of defeat to one thing and some to another. Some say the vote being taken on the Dominion Voter's List allowed a predominance of Tory votes. But we think the true cause was that after a trial of six years in Halton the Act was found to be unsatisfactory and not reaching the end desired by the Temperance men who voted for it. The great trouble with the Act is this, that it is a Federal Act, and all license and dealings with the Liquor traffic, should be under the Local Government.

Bro. Spurr's Opinion.

Dundalk Herald.

The repeal of the Scott Act in Halton County is the greatest blow the Temperance Party have received since the Dominion alliance organized and will do more to shake its power in other parts of the Province than all the legislation and lecturing of temperance workers can remedy. Halton was the pivot on which success or defeat for the whole Dominion rested and now it has turned nothing short of a miracle will reverse it.

A New Order of Things.

Chatsworth News.

The time was when children in our common schools were taught reading, writing and arithmetic. Now the time is taken up in teaching them prayers, singing, drawing and deportment. It will soon be that every well-regulated school will have to employ one or more dancing masters.

Decency in Stealing.

Dundalk Herald.

There is a decency even in stealing. If the person who has robbed the editor of half a cord of wood since the last snow storm had not been so abominably greedy as to take too big armfuls, dropping sticks of it on the sidewalk at every few paces in their hurry to get home, we might have been more lenient in our censure. As it is, the beggars, thieves, scoundrels or whatever they be, only deserve our most scornful reproach for their blundering, disgraceful and unchristian conduct.

A Philosophical Youth.

An old peasant was at the point of death, but the last stage of his illness was of long duration. One night his son left a candle burning near the dying man and went off to bed, saying as he left the room:

"Pa, when you think you're going, you can blow out the candle!"

Where Will the Public Come From.

Dundalk Herald.

The Flesherton ADVANCE speaking of Markdale extends its profoundest and most reverential congratulations on its recent elevation to the dignity of a town or town(ship) and wonders who will be Lord Mayor? In this there is no reason to wonder, the only wonder is when they get their mayor, town clerk, councillors civic officers, registrars etc., where the general public will come from.

A Leap-Year Proposal.

The opportunities and joys which leap year bring to the fair sex are not unattended with misery to unprotected masculiny. Here is a proposal just received by a Jordan, N. Y. bachelor:

Weedspot, Jennywerry 29—Dear Cir: I heer that you want to get a wife. I'm a widow with fore children and sixty-fore akers of land morgaged for $2,200. If you can pay off the morgage I will name the date, If knot don't answer; rite soon. P. S. I'm thirty ate, how old are you?

Qualified to Learn.

Farmer—I'd like for my son Jimmy to larn your trade.

Telegraph Operator—So you think he would like to manipulate the lightning, do you?

Father—Of course I do. The blamed fool can raise thunder now, and I guess he can soon larn to jerk lightnin'."

Where They Never Feel the Cold.

'Yes,' remarked the St. Paul man to a friend from Chicago as he stood arrayed in his blanket suit and adjusted a couple of buckskin chest protectors; 'yes, there is something about the air in this Northwestern climate which causes a person not to notice the cold. Its extreme dryness,' he added, as he drew on a pair of extra woolen socks, a pair of Scandinavian sheepskin boots, and some Alaska overshoes—'its extreme dryness makes a degree of cold, reckoned by the mercury, which would be unbearable in other latitudes, simply exhilarating here. I have suffered more with the cold in Michigan, for instance,' he added, as he drew on a pair of goatskin leggings, adjusted a double fur cap, and tied on some Esquimaux ear-muffs—'in Michigan or Illinois, we will say, with the thermometer at zero or above, than I have here with it from 45 to 55 below. The dryness of our winter air is certainly remarkable,' he went on, as he wound a couple of rods of red woolen scarf around his neck' wrapped a dozen newspapers around his body, drew on a full cloth overcoat, a winter-cloth overcoat, a light buffalo-skin overcoat, and a heavy polar-bear-skin overcoat; 'no, if you have never enjoyed our glorious Minnesota winter climate with its dry atmosphere, its bright sunshine, and invigorating ozone, you could scarcely believe some things I could tell you about it. The air is so dry,' he continued, as he adjusted his leather nose protector, drew on his reindeer-skin mittens and carefully closed one eyehole in the seal-skin mask that he drew down from his cap—'it is so dry that it actually seems impossible to feel the cold at all. We can hardle realize in the spring that we have had winter owing to the extreme dryness of the atmosphere. By the way,' he went on, turning to his wife, 'just bring me a couple of blankets and those bed-quilts and throw them over my shoulders, and hand me that mug with the soapstone in it, and now I'll take a swig at this jug of brandy and whale-oil, and then if you'll have the girl bring my snow shoes and iceberg scaling stick I'll step over and see them pry the workmen off the top of the ice palace who were frozen on yesterday. I tell you we wouldn't be going out this way 500 miles further south where the air is damp and chilly. Nothing but our dry air makes it possible.'—Chicago Tribune.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

The Washerwoman's Song.

Wring out the old, wring out the new,
Wring out the black, wring out the gray,
Wring out the white, wring out the blue—
And thus I wring my life away.

An occupation strange is my mine;
At least it seems to people droll
That while I'm working at the line
I'm going, too, from pole to pole.

Where'er I go I strive to please,
From morn to night I rub and rub.
I'm something like Diogenes—
I almost live within a tub.

To acrobats who vault and spring
In circuses I take shine;
They make their living in the ring,
And by the wringer I make mine

My calling's humble I'll agree,
But I am no cheap calico
As some folks are who sneer at me;
I'm something that will wash, you know.

I smile in calm, I strive in storm,
With life dullen ties I cope,
My duties cheerfully perform,
My motto: While there's life there's soap

Wring out the old, wring out the new,
Wring out the black, wring out the gray,
Wring out the white, wring out the blue—
And thus I wring my life away.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER XIV.

While Mrs. Home and the bar-maid were discussing with Latreille Shirley's chances of happiness, and admiring Sir Hugh's devotion to her, Shirley, in the little sitting-room upstairs, was suffering a martyrdom of anxiety and suspense, although she tried to conceal it from Sir Hugh, who was presiding over the coffee-equippage with as much awkwardness as it was possible for an essentially graceful man to exhibit. Shirley had made a slight movement toward the tray when it had been placed before her, but she had seemed so languid and indifferent that Sir Hugh had laughingly told her to rest, and that he would pour out the coffee. Shirley had sunk back wearily into the depths of the old fauteuil, and tried to withdraw her thoughts from Jack and the delay, and to take in some idea of her surroundings.

The sitting-room—which was on the first story of the house—was just the kind of room which one would have been likely to expect from the outside appearance of the Half-Moon Inn. It was wide and low-ceiled, with two quaint latticed windows overlooking the market place, and a wide old-fashioned grate with an open chimney. It was furnished with more attention to comfort than the sitting rooms of country inns generally exhibit. There was a thick carpet on the floor, and there were heavy red damask curtains at the windows. There was an old-fashioned bureau in one of the recesses on either side of the fireplace; in the other there was a what not which was decorated with some antiquated pieces of china. Shirley's eyes wandered over them; and she remembered long afterward wondering vaguely what the books could be which were on the lower shelf of the what-not. She noticed, too, vaguely enough, that there were some pictures on the walls, engravings after Landseer, and a photograph of Millais's "Black Brunswicker." Her eyes rested on the latter for a few moments; something in the young officer's face reminded her of Guy. Guy was not so handsome perhaps, but he had that resolute yet tender look about the mouth. Then her eyes left the picture and came back to Sir Hugh, who was still busy with the coffee. How handsome he was handsomer far than Guy, handsomer than the Black Brunswicker, the handsomest man she had ever seen she thought, as she watched him sitting there in his dark tweed suit; he had thrown off his driving-coat. As she looked at him, he raised his blue eyes, and as they met hers, he smiled.

"Are you thinking that I am a long time over this coffee?" he said lightly. "The fact is that it is made in a French coffee-pot, and it has not yet all run through some complicated business of a sieve-like nature at the top. But it is ready now," he added, "and I hope it will prove good enough to reward our patience."

He poured out a cup of coffee, added milk and sugar in careful proportions and brought it to her side.

"You are to drink it," he said, with imperative gentleness. "You are bound to obey me, you know. Wives always obey their lords and masters, don't they?"

"Dutiful wives," she answered, forcing a smile.

"And are not all wives dutiful?" he asked gayly.

"You do not expect me to abuse my own sex?" she returned, as lightly as she could. "No one need criminate themselves, Sir Hugh."

"I expect nothing from you but that you will drink this coffee," he said, smiling. "When you have done so, we will discuss the foibles of your sex. Well," he went on, as she put the cup to her lips, "is it good?"

"Excellent! I did not know that this was one of your accomplishments," she answered graciously.

"Never exercised but for you," he said quietly, as he went back to the table; and the tenderness of his voice brought the color to her cheeks, and she bent over the coffee-cup to hide the hot flush.

It was an awkward and difficult position in which she found herself, and every minute as it went by made it more awkward and difficult. If she could have looked upon Sir Hugh merely as Guy's friend and willing to help her in her trouble for the sake of the friendship he bore her future husband, three parts of the difficulty would have disappeared; but he was not Guy's friend only—he professed a deep passionate love for Guy's fiancee, and, although he had promised to conquer that love, every tone of his voice, even when his words sounded indifferent, every glance of the tender blue eyes showed Shirley that the love was not yet subdued.

The young girl felt her position keenly, and it added considerably to her anxiety and uneasiness. Moreover, she was haunted by a terrible fear of her uncle and aunt discovering where she had spent the afternoon, and ascertaining by chance that she had not gone to the Manse to have a chat with the girls there, as she had said she was going. It was true that she had called at the Manse, but she had not stayed there five minutes, having hastened away to meet Sir Hugh at the cross-roads. What would become of her if they met Sir Gilbert or any of the family and household on the way back? How could she excuse herself without betraying Jack? And she could not do that if it cost her all the happiness of her life. She would tell Guy, of course, and Sir Hugh knew it already. But no one else should ever know how her brother had fallen under temptation and risked his disgrace and dishonor. And, if Sir Gilbert and her aunt even got a hint of that long drive with Sir Hugh, what would they think—what would they say? How could she bear their reproaches?

She drank the coffee, and Sir Hugh, who had been watching her furtively, rose and took the empty cup. As she tried to thank him, her lip quivered, and the beautiful hazel eyes looked up at him so piteously that for a moment he felt remorse and keen pain on his own part, not in her present suffering, but in that which this day's work would cost her. It was too late now to draw back, and, even had it not been so, the passion of his love and jealousy and the girl's great beauty were urging him on irresistibly down that swift path which leads to treachery and sin.

"You are getting very anxious," he said cheerfully; "but by and by how you will laugh at your fears! Your brother will be here very shortly now."

"Do you think so—do you really think so?" she asked unsteadily. "I have no courage left; such a terrible foreboding seems to have come over me. I am so afraid that something has happened to Jack."

"What could have happened to him?" Sir Hugh said lightly. "In all probability he has either missed the train at Glasgow, or he has had to wait ever so long for a train at Weldon."

"I think he would be careful not to miss the train at Glasgow," Shirley observed, "because he would guess how anxious I am. Indeed I do not think he has treated me kindly at all—although, poor boy, I suppose he was too unhappy to be thoughtful or considerate."

"He must be careful in future not to get into such scrapes," Sir Hugh said. "I must tell him that if he should get into trouble again, he must not trouble you, my child; he must write direct to me."

"But, Sir Hugh, that is impossible," Shirley rejoined quickly, looking up. "What claim has Jack upon you? I could not allow such a thing."

"Jack is my wife's brother, and therefore my brother-in-law," said Sir Hugh, smiling; and the color rose slightly in his face as he averted his blue eyes for a moment; "and I shall be only too happy to assist him in any possible way. By the bye, we must see if we cannot find him some better berth than the one he fills at present. Such a good linguist as he is ought not to be vegetating in a merchant's office. Tell me," he continued, leaning his elbow on the mantel-piece, and looking down into the red glow of the fire—"how came he to get himself into this trouble? He is rather steady usually—is he not?"

"He always used to be very steady," said Shirley eagerly, lifting her earnest deprecating eyes to Sir Hugh's face. "He was always most thoughtful and good; but since he has been all alone I dare say he has felt having no home, and perhaps he has been led away by some of his companions."

"Most likely," Sir Hugh agreed promptly. "It is very hard for young fellows who are alone in large towns to keep themselves quite straight."

"I am afraid it is," Shirley sighed. "And at Glasgow I dare say he could get no other amusement but going to a club where his friends meet and where they play cards and smoke, and drink too, I am afraid," she added mournfully. "Oh, I wish he was a little more determined, so that when they ask him to play he would have courage to refuse!"

"This is the first time he has applied to you for assistance?" asked Sir Hugh gently.

"No, once before," she answered, coloring; "but he wanted only a small sum, and I was able to send it to him. But now I had spent all my allowance and—"

"Young ladies generally are in a state of impecuniosity, are they not?" he said, smiling. "I have often heard girls complain of being 'short of cash;' and my opinion is that their incomes are never large enough to cover their expenditure! However, I will tell your brother to look upon me as his banker in future. My dear child, don't attempt to dissuade me. I have heaps of money, as you know—but not enough to purchase happiness, though," he added mournfully.

"I hope Jack will have too much self-respect to need any more assistance," Shirley answered gravely. "And indeed you must not tell him so, Sir Hugh. It will only lead him into further temptation if he thinks that he can obtain money so easily. You see this time," she added, the hot color rising all over her fair pale face, from the chin to the soft rings of chestnut hair on her forehead, "he went on playing, hoping to win, and he lost and lost until he was almost mad, and then he took that money—Mr. Leeson's money—to pay his debt of honor; and—and but for your kindness what would have become of us both?" she finished brokenly, and there was a little embarrassed pause. "It is getting dark," Shirley said nervously then. "It will be very late by the time we get home, Sir Hugh."

He smiled a little; it was very pleasant to him to hear her say "we get home," and the blue eyes grew very tender as they went to her face.

"Tippoo shall do his best—and his best is a very good best, you know," he returned cheerily. "The days close in so early now, you know, that even when it is dark, it is still early in the afternoon. And I should think that even on a hot summer day it would be gloomy in this room."

Shirley rose restlessly and went across to the window. Sir Hugh followed and stood behind her, looking over her shoulder into the market-place. The market was over now, and the shops were beginning to light up; the lamps round the market-place were already lighted, and it looked quaint and curious and picturesque with its old-fashioned houses and the grotesque ugly fountain just facing them under the window.

"It reminds me of the Place of an old town in France where we spent a few days," Shirley said. "How the lamps are flickering, Sir Hugh! I am afraid the wind has risen very much."

"I am afraid it has," he answered regretfully. "I must wrap my little wife up well going home."

Again the hot blood rose in Shirley's face; but, before she could answer, Latreille threw open the room door, and announced, in rather an elevated tone of voice—

"The gentleman to see her ladyship, Sir Hugh."

A little cry of delight broke from Shirley as she turned from the window, and the next moment she was clasped in her brother's arms.

CHAPTER XV.

It was growing dark in the little sitting-room when Shirley lifted her head from her brother's shoulder with a long sigh of half pain, half relief. The fire was dying out, for they had both been too much absorbed to think of replenishing it; and Sir Hugh had left the room when Jack had entered it, hurrying over Shirley's nervous introduction with an awkward haste very foreign to his usual manner. And for nearly an hour the brother and sister had been alone.

They had had much to say to each other, and Shirley's sentences had often been interrupted by broken sobs which she could not repress, although she tried her utmost to check them in order not to add to Jack's already keen self-reproach. The young man had confessed all his folly. He had told her how he had suffered himself to be led away by his companions and lost the money—seventy pounds—a large sum to them—and how, rendered desperate by threats if the debt were not paid, he had taken the money from the cash-box intrusted to him, hoping that he might be able to refund it by degrees without detection; but some unforeseen circumstance had occurred which made it imperatively necessary that the money should be forthcoming on the morrow, and he had been in despair when he wrote to his sister.

"I thought you would manage to help me, Shirley," he said fondly; "you were always such a good little sister."

"But how could I have done so but for Sir Hugh?" she asked pitifully. "I could not even have sent to Guy—there was not time. Oh, Jack, you don't know what it has cost me!"

Poor child, she little guessed herself what it had cost her! She did not know until some weeks later when she paid the price.

"I am very sorry, dear," Jack said regretfully; but the load upon his heart had been relieved, and his elastic nature and naturally good spirits resumed their sway, even while he felt grieved at Shirley's sorrow. "You may be quite sure that I shall never give you such cause for unhappiness again. Sir Hugh must be an awfully generous fellow, Shirley."

"He is a friend of Guy," Shirley said, thankful for the darkness which hid her blushes.

"And how superbly handsome he is!" continued Jack, whose artistic eye had caught Sir Hugh's beauty at a glance. "Do you know that they all think you are his wife here, Shirley? How do you like being 'her ladyship?' Will you be vexed if I say I wish you were engaged to him instead of Major Stuart?"

"You do not know Guy," Shirley said simply. "Sir Hugh has been very good and kind, but he is not Guy."

"No, but he is a much richer and grander and handsomer personage," rejoined Jack smiling. "And I should be better pleased to see my beautiful sister Lady Glynn than Mrs. Stuart."

"You would not if you cared for your sister's happiness, Jack," Shirley said earnestly. "I love Guy with all my heart."

"I cannot imagine how you fell in love with him when Sir Hugh was to the fore," Jack observed rather discontentedly.

"Perhaps Alice has marked Sir Hugh for her own," Shirley said lightly. "Jack, you are going back to-night?"

"Yes; my train leaves in an hour."

"I wish I dare stay," Shirley said wistfully, "but I am afraid I shall get into trouble as it is. We shall have to drive home fast."

"Will you, Lady Glynn?" interrogated Jack. "Shirley, dear, you have not given me the money," he added in a shamed hurried manner; and Shirley started almost guiltily.

"How stupid of me!" she said. "Sir Hugh has it. I wonder where he is. I had better go and ask him," she added, shrinking a little at the thought.

"No, don't go," Jack advised, interpreting the little gesture rightly. "Write a few lines and send it to him. You must not be seen down there now, Shirley. The passage and bar are full of men."

"But there are no writing materials here," she said; "and I could not see to write, Jack."

"We will remedy that," Jack returned, carelessly, striking a match and lighting the candles on the mantel-piece. "And here are pens and ink," he added, crossing to the what-not and bringing to the table a heavy leaden inkstand adorned with two or three quill pens. "Here you are, Shirley," he said, lightly. "These are the pens you most delight in; and here is a sheet of paper," he concluded, tearing off the blank page of a letter which he took from his pocket.

"You are quite a man of resource, Jack," Shirley remarked, smiling. Her spirits had risen now, and she was full of joy at the thought of her brother's deliverance and his promises of amendment. "What am I to say?"

Jack laughed.

"I don't quite know how wives address their husbands," he said; "but you had better write in that manner, in case the person who takes the note is inquisitive enough to look at its contents. You see I am a man of precaution, Shirley, as well as a man of resource."

"Do you think I ought to put 'Dear Sir Hugh?'" asked Shirley, dubiously, kneeling by the table, pen in hand, as with puzzled eyes she looked up at her brother.

"I am sure you ought not," he said, laughing. "Do you think that the future Lady Glynn would call her husband 'Sir Hugh' during the honeymoon?"

"I don't know," Shirley answered, coloring. "But I cannot say 'Dear Hugh,'" she added, smiling a little.

"Then say 'Dear husband,'" Jack suggested, lightly. "Sir Hugh will appreciate the joke."

Shirley hesitated a moment and then wrote in her pretty half-foreign handwriting the words he had suggested. They looked very strange and startling, she thought, as she looked at them gravely.

"Well, dear," Jack said, "can't you continue?"

"Yes," she replied, hesitatingly. "Shall I say that he has forgotten the object of our visit here, and that I am waiting?"

"Something to that effect," Jack said. "Put it as prettily as you can, Shirley. He has been so good to us."

"I need send only a few lines," she remarked, writing rapidly for a minute, with a little smile on her lips; and when she had finished the note she passed it to her brother.

"Will that do?" she asked, smiling; and Jack read, smiling, also the few light words that she had written, every one of which told so terribly against the writer a few weeks later.

"That will do capitally," Jack said, approvingly, and, after he had rung the bell, they stood together before the dying fire, waiting in silence.

A smart knock at the door was followed almost immediately by the entrance of the neat-looking maid-servant who had already waited upon Shirley and Sir Hugh.

"Did you ring, my lady?" she asked.

Jack glanced at his sister with a little smile which brought the color into her face.

"Yes," she said, quietly. "Will you take this note to—to my husband?" she added, with a little effort.

"Yes, my lady," the maid answered, looking somewhat surprised as she took the note and left the room.

Shirley waited with her hand on her brother's arm until the girl came back with a little twisted note and a pocket-book from Sir Hugh. Coloring crimson, Shirley handed the pocket-book to her brother and glanced over the little note. It ran—

"DEAR LITTLE WIFE—I do not like to hurry you; but as we want to keep our little escapade a secret for the present, it will be safer to start at once.

Your devoted husband,

HUGH GLYNN."

"What a brick he is!" Jack said, warmly, as he glanced at the contents of the pocket-book. "I can never be grateful enough. I will begin to save at once, Shirley; you may be sure of that."

"Now, we had better go," Shirley said, nervously, crushing Sir Hugh's little missive in her hand and throwing it carelessly upon the table. "It is getting very late. Oh, I am afraid—" She broke off suddenly, unwilling to grieve her brother with the thought that he might have got her into trouble at home.

"Yes, I must not keep you," answered Jack, huskily. "My darling, how can I ever thank you enough?"

"You will not—" she began, wistfully, her sweet eyes looking up into his through a mist of tears; and, although the sentence remained unfinished, Jack finished it rightly in his own mind.

"Never, again, my dear little sister," he said, fondly; and the kiss which ratified the promise had something solemn in its tenderness.

"I ought to thank Sir Hugh," Jack remarked presently; and then, while Shirley began putting on her heavy sealskin jacket, he added, hastily, "I will go down to him, dear."

He left the room, returning after a few moments with Sir Hugh, who was already equipped for the drive home.

Jack's face was pale and earnest, while Sir Hugh looked a little nervous and agitated, Shirley thought. She fancied that Jack's gratitude had distressed him.

"The dog cart is quite ready, Shirley," he said, quietly. "Are you well wrapped up? Latreille was thoughtful enough to put a shawl in the dog-cart. It is too soon to take your brother to the station, I think."

"Yes, he has three quarters of an hour yet," Shirley answered. "You had better get something to eat, Jack."

"Yes. Don't linger, Shirley dear," he counseled quickly. "I had no idea it was so late."

They went down-stairs together, and the landlady and the barmaid and two or three stragglers hurried out curiously to have a look at the distinguished company who had caused no little excitement at the Half-Moon Inn that afternoon. Not that there was anything wonderful to see—simply a tall handsome man in a fur-lined coat, a slender, shrinking, closely-veiled girl leaning on his arm, and a young man at her other side who bade them farewell at the door, leaving Sir Hugh to lift his companion into the dog-cart.

"Good-by, Jack—dear Jack!" Shirley whispered, stooping down to her brother.

Sir Hugh said a word or two in a quick undertone to Latreille, who left the horse's head and re-entered the inn for a minute, returning almost immediately with the same impenetrable impassive countenance, and taking up his position at Tippoo's head without a trace of discomposure.

Sir Hugh climbed to his place and took the reins, Jack stood back upon the pavement with a very self-satisfied look, while Mrs. Home's beribboned cap rose and fell in a succession of courtesies which at any other time would have excited Shirley's merriment.

"Take care of her, Sir Hugh," Jack said, earnestly.

"Trust me, Ross. I can and will take care of my own," he answered, smiling as he drew the thick soft shawl around her carefully. "All right, Latreille."

They drove off quickly across the lighted market-place; and Jack Ross stood watching the dog-cart as it disappeared in the darkness, then he turned back into the inn, with a look of anxiety and care upon his face.

He ordered a cup of coffee, and returned to the sitting-room, where the fire had died out, but where the candles were still burning. The pens and ink remained upon the table, but the little twisted note which Shirley had thrown there was no longer lying on the red cloth table-cover. But Jack Ross had no thought for it; saying to himself, sorrowfully, what pity it was that Shirley did not care Sir Hugh, and hoping that something would occur that would make her change mind.

Months afterward the thoughts which had occupied his mind as he sat before the empty grate in the sitting-room at the Half Moon Inn came back to him with a keen sting of remorse and pain, and a thrill of almost horror at the part he had unwittingly played in his sister's betrayal.

Meanwhile, through the cold east wind and over the dark country roads, Sir Hugh Glynn drove rapidly and in almost unbroken silence; while Shirley was in an agony of dread lest her absence should have occasioned remark at Fairholme Court.

Once or twice Sir Hugh bent down with a tender little inquiry as to whether she was tired or cold, but Shirley felt more grateful to him for the consideration which left her quiet.

As they drew near Fairholme, he said, smiling—

"I think I had better drive you up to the house, Shirley. I am sure you would be terrified to death to walk up that ghostly avenue alone."

"Oh, no—oh, no—indeed, I can go!" she said, eagerly. "They would hear the wheels."

"But I could say that I had picked you up on the way," answered the baronet

"Nevertheless Uncle Gilbert would be seriously angry," she declared. "Indeed, Sir Hugh, it will be kindest to leave me."

"I certainly did not intend to let you walk up the avenue alone, Shirley," he said, decidedly. "They won't hear my footsteps, you foolish child!"

CARRYING A "LUCKY PIECE."

How the Custom Is Maintained by All Classes.

Two ladies met on Woodward avenue. As they stopped to speak one of them dropped her pocketbook and the money in it rolled out on the sidewalk.

"Too bad," said the other, as she assisted her friend to restore the contents. "It's such bad luck to drop money unless it belongs to some one else."

"I don't mind," answered the owner of the pocketbook, "because, you see, I carry a lucky piece."

This habit of carrying a piece of money for luck has become something more than a superstition, since it is a practice common among all classes.

"I wouldn't take $100 for that sixpence," said a staid business man recently. "I found it in my mother's purse when she died and I have always kept it as a souvenir."

He did not say that it brought him luck or that he had any superstition connected with it, but he unconsciously valued it as a charm. There is a piece of bone that is taken from a fish, called a sheep's head, which shows plainly the imprint of the letter "L." Theatrical people value this very highly as a lucky piece.

The Scotch have a fashion of handing back a trifling bit of coin when a payment is made. This is called a lucky penny and is always carefully treasured.

It is impossible to find a pocketbook that does not have some trifling charm in it to bring luck to its owner. It may be a coin, a stone, a chicken's wishbone, a child's first tooth or a smooth sixpence, but it is expected to accomplish some or all of these missions: Keep off disease; avert the evil eye; protect the person carrying it from bodily harm; bring prosperity in business, love, courtship and marriage; thwart the evil designs of enemies; insure a safe journey and perform many other apparent miracles.—Detroit Free Press.

Bill Nye Discourses on Capital Punishmen

Too many people are now committing capital crimes for the purpose of getting into the papers. Some day the gentleman who kills his parents because they will not pass the molasses will not be permitted to make a speech on the gallows, but he will step into a seventy-five-dollar scarlet plush chair, and while he is reading the morning paper the Governor will touch a small collar-button in his office, which connects by wire with the plush chair, and a brief autopsy is all that will be necessary. That element in our natures which seems to demand dying speeches, long black funerals, harrowing details, blood, horror, wails of anguish, dull thuds, cold creepy crape, and the sickening smell of coffin varnish in a close room, is a relic of the times when we used to live in hollow trees and eat acorns.

A Useful Dog.

Lady of the house to new servant—What do you mean by giving that dog that good meat?"

"I do it to encourage the poor animal."

"Encourage him to do what?"

"To keep on helping me to wash the dinner dishes clean. I don't have to wash them hardly at all, he licks them so clean."

Hugo Stanly (a young dude who is very attentive to the fair sex in general, and to Miss Hummel in particular, who detests him)—Is Miss Hummel in?

Servant—Yes, Hugo, she's in.

Hugo—Perhaps you had better tell her who it is.

Servant—No; if I do that she will say that she is not in.

The Longed-for Letter.

As the last note of that touching little ballad "The Letter That He Longed for Never Came" vibrated on the evening air, she turned to find a tear trickling slowly down his cheek. "Ah, Mr. Sampson," she said sympathetically, "you, too, have 'longed.'" "Yes," he replied huskily, "two years ago a very dear friend of mine went west on $25 which I loaned him, and for aught I know he may be dead."—The Epoch.

Two-year-old Dorothy has had a severe case of chicken-pox. She came down with it the very day that the family had chicken for dinner. No one imagined that Dorothy thought that there was any connection between the dinner and the disease until, a few days afterward, just as the baby was getting better, a turkey was brought on for dinner. Dorothy refused to eat it, saying: "The chicken made me have chicken-pox, mamma, and I don't want to eat turkey and have turkey-pox."—Woman's Tribune.

THE DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The first of the questions to be put by members as given on the notice paper was allowed to stand over. The next was that curious one given notice of by Mr. Guillet as to what the Government proposed to do about Mr. Ellis, M. P. for St. John, who had advocated the union of Canada and the United States. Mr. Guillet, though present, did not rise. Inviting cries of "Go on," "Go on," from the Liberal side, were raised, but Mr. Guillet remained silent. The Speaker waited a few minutes and then said "Dropped," thus ruling the question off the paper. The result was greeted with derisive laughter by the Opposition.

Hon. Thomas White and Sir Hector Langevin, in reply to a question by Sir Richard Cartwright, gave some information in relation to the late Haldimand election. The commissioners to value the improvements on the Indian lands in the vicinity of Cayuga occupied by squatters were appointed on the 15th October last, the lands having been surveyed in 1883. A circular was issued on the 28th October warning the squatters of the appointment of the commissioners. A site for a post-office was purchased in Cayuga for $450 and a contract was let for the building at about $28,000.

In the absence of Mr. Curran, of Montreal, Mr. Desjardins, a resident of the same city, asked whether the Government intended this session to relieve the harbor of Montreal of the charge of interest on the Lake Ste. Peter debt. Sir Hector Langevin replied that the subject was under consideration

The greater part of the afternoon was occupied with a discussion of the resolution presented by Mr. Wallace, of West York, calling for a committee to investigate the nature and effect of the combinations said to exist with reference to the purchase and sale in Canada of any foreign or Canadian products. Mr. Wallace spoke at some length. He declared his opinion in opening that certain combinations of business men, to advance the interests of their business, were perfectly right and proper, but combinations to fix the prices to be demanded by manufacturers for their goods and by the dealers in those goods as well, he held to be inimical to the public welfare and an interference with the rights of the people in trade. He quoted the statements of Lightbound, Ralston & Company, showing the exactions of the sugar combine, and pointed out that these directly tended to drive out of business all who were not connected with the Grocers' Guild. In anthracite coal there was a ring, which the abolition of the Customs duty had not destroyed, which kept the price in Toronto at about $7 per ton, whereas, according to the cost of labor, freight, etc., coal could be sold in Toronto at $4 a ton and give 25 per cent. profit to every person handling it. There were combines in other lines as well, and owing to the enormous gains reaped by those who had entered these organizations the tendency of the system was constantly to spread and include other articles. Nor was this pernicious system confined to Canadian and American products, for English manufacturers in several lines dictated to the Canadian dealers at what rates they should sell the goods. His preference, he said, was to have the duties left on, for then the combines would be more under the control of the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. Edgar said that when he saw the notice of motion in the name of Mr. Wallace he thought a new era had begun. He heartily concurred in what had been said against combines, and supported the resolution, but pointed out that the motion did not refer to manufacturing combines, covering only the purchase and sale of articles as specified. He strongly contended that this ought not to be left beyond the range of the investigation. In a few words he pointed out with telling emphasis how the prophecies of the Liberals at the time the protective system was adopted had come true; first, a period of increased prosperity for manufactures existing at the inception of the policy, then a rush of capital into the protected industries, leading to over production, an unhealthy competition and loss, then combination and an increase of prices. These results had not been worked out in the United States, with their sixty millions of population, until after twenty years of protection, but in the restricted market of Canada eight years had been sufficient to complete the course, and affairs to-day stood exactly as the Liberals claimed they would. He denied that it was possible for combines in manufactured articles to exist without a protective tariff. The coal combine had a natural monopoly, for there was no duty on anthracite in the United States and such a monopoly was entirely independent of the tariff. He expressed a strong belief that combines were more to be feared at present by Americans than by Canadians, because of the greater hold they had secured upon the public men on the other side of the line. He regretted that Mr. Wallace had not followed the example of leading Republican Protectionists of the United States in declaring that if it were necessary to do away with protection in order to kill the combines he would be willing to take that step. He quoted the ringing words of Mr. Masson, of Chicago, to this effect. In closing he moved to amend the resolution so as to add the "manufacture and sale," as well as "purchase and sale" of articles as mentioned, so as to enlarge the inquiry to include manufacturers' combines.

After the speeches the debate became general. Mr. Guillet made a speech, in which he declared his opinion that to remove the protective duties would be to expose the people of Canada to the far worse combines of the United States. He thought that Mr. Edgar's suggestion might well be accepted, being quite sure there was no intention on the part of the mover of limiting the scope of the investigation.

Then came Mr. Lister. He declared for the radical cure suggested by Mr. Edgar—the repeal of the protective duties.

Dr. Sproule, of Grey, then took up the cudgels on the other side, and accused Mr. Lister of favoring protection to the oil interest of his (Mr. Lister's) own County of Lambton, which Mr. Lister admitted, holding that so long as the protective system was maintained that industry should not be singled out to be placed at a disadvantage.

Mr. Wallace quoted Mr. Lister's words in the case referred to, which bore out what the latter had claimed, and spoke briefly in answer to what had been said. He accepted Mr. Edgar's amendment.

Hon. Peter Mitchell, who, as a Montrealer, has special opportunity for observing the ill effect of combines, spoke strongly in support of the motion. He condemned particularly the effects of the coal oil ring, while admitting that if he had been in Mr. Lister's place he would have taken exactly his view of the case. He announced himself as a National Policy man, as the National Policy was understood in 1878, but said he opposed strongly such duties as were now imposed. He believed in a reduction of the duties to a reasonable level, but warmly declared that the true plan was to seek improved trade relations with the United States. He appealed especially to the Finance Minister, Sir Charles Tupper, whose ability he lauded. Sir Charles looked at him like a sphinx until Mr. Mitchell spoke of him as "the gentleman whom I am glad to see occupy his high place, so long as I can't occupy it myself," and then a smile broke over the Finance Minister's features while the House laughed heartily. Mr Mitchell urged the Government to take hold of this matter vigorously, and said he saw no reason why they should not, unless it was, as he feared, that the contributions the members of combines had made to keep the Government in power had given them too great a hold upon the Government. "If that is so," he said, "then poor, unfortunate Canada, I pity you!" a sentiment which was greeted with loud cheering. The resolution was carried, Mr. Edgar's amendment being incorporated. The following form the committee: Messrs. Bain (Soulanges), Bain (Wentworth), Richard Boyle, Casgrain, Daly, Flynn, Gillmor, Guillet, Granbois, Landry, McDougald (Pictou), McKay, Fisher, Wood (West Northumberland) and Wallace.

Mr. White, referring to the inquiry of Mr. McMullen on the previous day regarding the alleged overcharge claimed by the Dominion Land Agent at Regina, for furnishing information to an intending settler, said the original papers in the case showed that the fee of one dollar and twenty cents was all that was asked for preparing plots of nine townships and not twenty-one dollars and fifty cents as Mr. McMullen had stated.

Mr. Davin said he knew the Regina agent, and believed the charge was entirely without foundation.

Mr. Watson exonerated the regular Government land agents from the charge of extortion, but said that the agents of the colonization companies, who were occasionally authorized to act for the Dominion Government, were guilty of charging outrageous fees and fleecing the settlers.

Mr. White, in answer to the inquiry of Sir Richard Cartwright, said the sum of $150,701 had been received from the sale of lands in Manitoba and the Northwest during the year 1887.

Mr. Guillet proceeded to inquire what action the Government proposed to take in the case of Mr. Ellis, member for St. John, who, he alleged, had declared himself an advocate of annexation with the United States, contrary to his oath of allegiance to the Queen, by which he qualified as a member of the House.

Mr. Lister raised a point of order. The question contained an allegation and a reflection on a member of the House.

Mr. Speaker ruled the question out of order on the ground raised by Mr. Lister.

Sir Charles Tupper laid on the table the estimates for the fiscal year ending June, 1889, which, on motion, were referred to the Committee of Supply.

Sir Richard Cartwright congratulated the Finance Minister on the promptitude with which the estimates had been brought down, and inquired when the House might expect the financial statement.

Sir Charles Tupper said he was not able to give the exact date, but it was his intention to proceed with the estimates, as was the practice in England, in advance of the Budget speech.

Sir Richard Cartwright said that was a new departure, but he was not disposed to raise any objection to it. He had no doubt it had been well considered, and he thought there was some convenience in it. He presumed the budget would not be delivered at any rate as early as next week.

Sir Charles Tupper—No.

Mr. Barron asked if the Government intend to pay Mrs. Gowanlock, widow of Mr. Gowanlock, who was killed by the Indians at Frog Lake during the late Northwest rebellion, a pension in the same manner and to the same extent as was paid to Mrs. Delaney.

Mr. White replied that Mr. Gowanlock was not in the employ of the Indian Department, while Mr. Delaney was. The former was at the time of the outbreak building a mill at Battleford, for which the Department was paying his firm a bonus. Mr. Delaney was a farm instructor. Mrs. Gowanlock had already received for her personal loss $907, and the firm of which her husband was a member had been paid $4,202, half of which went to the estate of the deceased.

Mr. Pope, in reply to Mr. Weldon (St. John), said that $3,971,000 was the amount charged to the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway during the last four fiscal years.

Mr. Taylor, in moving the House into committee of the whole to consider a resolution declaring it expedient to introduce a Bill providing for the regulation, manufacture and sale of rendered lard, said he believed there was as great necessity for legislation to restrict the importation of adulterated lard as there was in the case of butter. The result of the Oleomargarine law passed two sessions ago was that our imports of butter, so called, had decreased by about one million pounds. Of the three and a half million pounds of lard that were imported during last year, he had no doubt that a large proportion was of spurious manufacture, cotton seed oil and other injurious substances entering into its composition. The lard that was manufactured within the country was not so adulterated. The interests of the agriculturists, he believed, demanded that the production of lard should be protected in the same way as butter, by having the imported article detained in bond till it is properly inspected and analyzed.

Mr. Sproule supported the motion, which was carried.

Some returns were called for, and the House adjourned at 6 o'clock.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

Mr. Clancy moved for an order of the House for a return showing the estimated cost, if any, and actual cost per yard for each drain constructed by or under the Government within the counties of Lambton, Kent, Elgin and Essex and the name of the engineer or other person employed by the Ontario Government to make such estimate. The price per yard at which the work was let and whether at public sale or by tender. The salaries or other remuneration paid the engineers or other persons employed by the Ontario Government to superintend the construction of the said drainage works, and charged to the said works respectively. The hon. member charged that he had not been fairly treated in connection with his request for these returns. Other members had asked last session for returns on various matters, and they had been furnished this session, but the returns he had asked for had not been.

Hon. Mr. Fraser promised that these also should be brought down.

Mr. Meredith asked if the resolution passed in 1884, requiring that there should be laid upon the table during the first ten days of every session a statement shewing the indebtedness of each municipality in arrears, had been complied with this year He thought the resolution had been complied with every year until the present. He had not seen it this year. He would ask what steps had been taken by the Government with a view to setting up those arrears.

Hon. Mr. Ross (Huron) said the return alluded to had not been yet brought down. The Department had been exceptionally busy during the past year, as some of the members knew from proceedings conducted elsewhere, but he would promise to have them laid before the House as soon as possible. As to the steps taken to wind up such arrears, he would say that he had made some progress. It was a very difficult matter once a municipality got into arrears to enforce collection of indebtedness; the Government, however, was doing its best.

Mr. Waters moved the second reading of his Bill to amend the Assessment Act. He explained that the object of the Bill was to do away with the assessment of farming stock. There were two reasons why this system should be abolished. One was that where capital was assessed income should not be. That was a principle that was generally admitted. The second reason was that the scale of assessment of farming stock was unfair and inequitable. The hon. gentleman went into these points minutely, and then asked that the Bill be read a second time and, if the House thought proper, referred then to the Municipal Committee.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Conmee moved the second reading of his Bill to amend the Municipal Act. He explained that its object was to enable municipal corporations to construct water works for special purposes only. This amendment proposed to give them power to construct such works for general purposes. The Bill also proposed changes in the method of assessing for the cost of such works.

The Bill was read a second time.

The House went into committee, Mr. Awrey in the chair, and reported the following Bills:

Respecting the Methodist Church of Aurora—Mr. Widdifield.

To authorise the trustees of Toronto General Burying Grounds to sell certain lands—Mr. E. F. Clarke.

To provide for the division of the township of Walsingham—Mr. O'Connor.

The House adjourned at 5.15.

"They generally bang the door against the toes of tramps."

"And they ought to. Not one tramp in fifty knows how to work a house."

"How did you work that one?"

"Well, my ring at the bell was answered by a servant girl. I lifted my cap to her and said:

"'Thanks, ma'am. Bon jour, republique ma foi.'

"'Oh, of course.'

"'Sabe que es pulque camarjo?'

McGARIGLE TALKS.

He Tells a Chicago "Times" Reporter How He Escaped.

A POOR OPINION OF ST. KITTS.

The Chicago Times contains a column and a half about W. J. McGarigle. The report was sent from Hamilton, and the reporter had a talk with Chicago's ex-Warden which extended over an entire afternoon. Here are some facts: Mr. McGarigle is no longer [illegible] St. Catharines, and for this fact is to be admired. Twenty-four hours in St. Catharines is equal to a cycle [illegible]. Of all the stupid, sleepy, stick-in-the-mud towns I ever visited St. Catharines takes the lead. It wakes up about 10 in the morning and is sleepily drunk by 3 in the afternoon. A couple of wretched hotels, a long stretch of stores, apparently opened in sublime indifference to how much or how little business is done, a few flour mills on the Welland Canal, which slopes along the foot of the hill on which the town is placed, the customary number of churches, a measly opera house (heaven save the mark!)—and the picture of St. Catharines is complete. And this is the town in which Mr. McGarigle has spent a good deal of his time since he first came to Canada. If he chose it with the idea of inflicting a self-imposed penance the severity of his judgment cannot be questioned. It is admirably adapted to the purpose of a penal colony.

About his escape McGarigle said: "Sheriff Matson and the two others were eating fruit in the parlor, and I went into another room to see my wife, as I had done many times before. I remember that I went down stairs and chatted with my wife, ate a piece of pie and drank a glass of milk. I then went out to the barn and talked to my boy about my horses and cows, and then walked leisurely to the front of the house, got into a rig and drove away. That's all. As I went out to the rig I passed within ten feet of Matson."

"You didn't make any pretence about a bath, then?"

"None whatever."

"Why did you determine to leave?"

"Well, the jail life was wearing me down. I should have gone crazy if I had stayed there. Then, when I first went there I had some hope of a fair trial, but as the weeks went on the issue became more and more indefinite, and I saw that I had got to suffer or join the gang of squealers. So I left."

"Did Dr. St. John connive at your escape?"

"No. Dr. St. John had no more notion of my intentions than you had."

"Did the captain of the boat know who you were?"

"Irvine did not know who I was, nor what my object was in sailing with him when I got into his boat. He knew a person would come if he could get there in time."

"How?"

"I had a letter almost a year old giving me permission to go out on the Blake or send any one else I chose for a trip on the lake, and during the day word was sent somebody would go out with him that night, if—as I said before—he could get there in time."

"You exculpate Captain Irvine, then, from all complicity in your escape?"

"Capt. Irvine," and McGarigle spoke with great earnestness, "he is as innocent of any complicity in that matter as you are."

"Well, you had an exciting trip on the lake?"

"No; at least not so much so as it would have been had I known what I afterward knew."

"Did you sight any of your pursuers?"

"I saw one tug which I heard was in pursuit, but I afterward learned that the people on board were at the time so stupidly drunk that they could not see beyond the rail of their own boat."

"How long were you on the lake?"

"From the 23rd till the 30th of July."

"Where did you land?"

"At Point Edward; but not from the Blake. One night about midnight I hailed the Marsh and boarded her. It was a bright, moonlight night, but the sea was running high and the transfer was exciting."

"You went right to St. Catharines?"

"Well, I stopped at London and Hamilton on the way, and then went to St. Catharines to see Mr. Frederick St. John, for the purpose of telling him I had not landed from the Blake. He, however, was at Port Colborne, and I drove down there at once, and threw the reporters and detectives off the track. They couldn't make out how I got there."

"You were pretty well beleaguered with newspaper men and detectives at first, were you not?"

"Oh, yes. They swarmed after me, but they didn't see me. Why, I have ridden into a station with my hand on the throttle of the engine, dressed as an engineer, when I could have reached out and hit a newspaper man that was waiting for me on the head with my black cap. He went through the train to look for me, but he didn't begin at the beginning," and Mac laughed as he said: "I didn't serve my time in a machine shop for nothing. I have travelled almost constantly. I have been up North in the timber lands, and I've been to Quebec and Victoria, and, in fact, it would be difficult to say where I have not been. I guess I know almost as much about the Canadian Pacific as Mr. Van Horne himself."

"And do you manage to make a living?"

"Yes, indeed. I can go to France and make a living. I've invested in real estate at the 'Soo,' and also at Duluth. In fact, I've been in the United States twice since I left. I have been a great deal into the northern parts of Canada, and there is a very rich country up there—rich in minerals of all kinds and timber. There's plenty to see and do over here, and I am not wasting my time, you can depend on that."

A Year's Wooing.

'Twas autumn when first they stood on the bridge:
Ripe pears on the pear tree, ripe corn on the ridge;
The swallows flew swiftly far up in the blue,
And speeding still southward, were lost to the view.
Said he, "Can you love me, as I can love you?"
She said, quite demurely, 'Already I do!"

'Twas winter when next they met on the bridge
The pear trees were brown, and white was the ridge;
The swallows were feathering their nests in Algiers,
She looked in his face, and she burst into tears
His nose it was pinched, and his lips they were blue,
Said she, "I can't love you!" said he, "Nor I you!"

'Twas spring-time when next they stood on the bridge,
And white was the pear-tree and green was the ridge;
The swallows had thoughts of a speedy return,
And the midgers were dancing adown the brown burn.
He said, "Pretty maiden, let bygones go by—
Can you love me again?" she said, "I can try.

'Twas summer when next they stood on the bridge;
There were pears on the pear tree, tall corn on the ridge;
The swallows wheeled round them, far up in the blue,
Then swooped down and snapped up a midgelet or two.
Said he, "Lest some trifle should come in the way
And part us again, will you mention the day?"
She stood, looking down on the fast-flowing rill,
Then answered, demurely, "As soon as you will!"

STRANGER THAN FICTION.

The Queer Experience of Tennie C. Claflin

Tennie C. Claflin (that was) returned to this city last week from London, bearing the matrimonial title of "Lady Cook and Marquise de Montserrat." In 1872 this very woman, together with her sister, Victoria Woodhull, were prisoners in Ludlow street jail. Such are among the contrasts which prove that truth is stranger than fiction. The above mentioned sisters were probably the most remarkable women that ever appeared in this city. They came from Chicago because New York offered a wider field for their ambition, and here they opened an office for stock speculation. The real object, however, was to revive the free love notions which then only required a leader, and to make themselves the apostles of this attractive but pernicious scheme. They were largely endowed with personal magnetism, which was felt by all they met, but Theodore Tilton, being unusually susceptible, became completely fascinated, and this eventually led to his ruin. They went, however, for still higher game—nothing less indeed than Beecher himself. In this they failed, and in retaliation they published the first clearly pronounced article on the "scandal" which filled eight columns of the Woodhull & Claflin weekly. This led to their arrest and imprisonment in Ludlow street jail, where they were held nearly a week, when bail was obtained and they were released. It is highly probable that if they had never printed that offensive statement the whole train of horrid scandal might have been avoided. Their publication, however, was not aimed at Beecher alone—Tilton was also included. Victoria had announced a lecture in this city, and as Tilton was one of her disciples, she requested him to appear on the rostrum and introduce her to the audience. He declined, fearing it would impair his position as editor of the Independent. Victoria, however, was not to be put off with excuses and she repeated her demand. Being disappointed, she determined to stir up a cauldron of hell-broth for these men, and she succeeded far beyond her wildest expectations, later on. Having eventually exhausted their influence here they sought a new sphere in London. In fact, the scandal reacted on them in a killing manner and they were glad to leave New York without any greater injury than a week in Ludlow street jail. On arriving in London they met a degree of success of different character from that which they had achieved either in Chicago or New York. This was in the matrimonial line, and while Victoria married a man of large wealth, Tennie made a still higher conquest by becoming the wife of a baronet, who also had the title of marquis, both of which she shared. Lady Cook will remain here long enough to attend to some business matters, but it is hardly probable that she will visit Ludlow street jail, where the contrast might recall the words of Byron: "A palace and a prison at either hand."—New York Correspondence.

Two Kinds of Pneumonia.

There are two distinct forms of pneumonia. One of these always follows an attack of bronchitis (a cold in the lungs); in this the lung is inflamed in patches or lobules scattered over both lungs alike. This is the form that is so fatal in children and old people. It is termed catarrhal pneumonia. The other, that which attacks adults suddenly, often in the midst of apparent health, is called "croupous or lobar pneumonia," because one lobe only of one lung is usually attacked. The last named form is not caused by cold although the first symptoms is a severe chill without shivering, which would seem to show that a chilling of the body had really caused the whole trouble. The catarrhal form always follows a catarrh of the bronchial tubes; it is never the first event in a chain of disease, but always secondary. This form is probably sometimes caused by exposure to cold—it certainly is if any catarrh is thus caused. Although there are many plausible reasons for thinking that cold never causes "a cold," there are some facts that seem to prove that a catarrh of the air passages may thus be caused. If one of the lower animals, a frog, for example, have a portion of its surface thoroughly chilled by the application of ice or a freezing mixture, it often happens that both lungs become intensely congested or overfilled with blood as a consequence. If this congestion be repeated two or three times, a genuine catarrhal pneumonia results. This sequence of events is too constant in occurrence to be considered a mere coincidence.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A little damsel of mature reasoning and with the eternal wisdom of childhood drew a long breath at the breakfast table the other Sabbath, in one of our two cities, and laid down her fork. "There," said she, "I'm so glad that Rev. Mr. B—— is going to preach in exchange with papa to-day, because he tells interesting stories. I do wish that papa was only just an ordinary man, so that I could go and hear somebody else preach now and then."—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

Transient Traders.

The Canadian Advocate treats these gentry as follows:—All over the country there are merchants who at this time are made the victims of a vicious business system. Many have been struggling for years to build up a legitimate trade. Their goods are taxed, perhaps they have given long credit to their customers, and when hard times come and collections are slow it is difficult to meet their obligations. Just when trade is at its lowest ebb some speculator in bankrupt goods leases an empty store or hall and proceeds to sell at slaughter prices, as compared with the resident merchant. The climax of the wrong is that men who have a long over-due account at the established store are the ones who can raise a little ready money in order to secure the bargains. The only remedy for this is for municipalities to place a fee on these transient traders sufficiently heavy to compel them to get a fair value for their goods in order to meet the demand.

About a Cedar.

Hanover Post.

On Thursday last information was laid by Mr. Geo. Adlam, Con. 4, Bentinck, against Mr. S. Hillis of the same locality, charging him with drawing a revolver and threatening to shoot. The case came up for hearing at Reid's hotel on Friday afternoon before Magistrates J. Proctor and Duncan Campbell. Mr. F. O'Connor was present on behalf of defendant. The evidence went to show that the plaintiff and defendant live on adjoining lots. Plaintiff's son was in the bush and intended hauling away a cedar tree which was lying on the ground near the line. Defendant came along and ordered young Adlam to leave the tree, which he did, and went home and informed his father, who said he would go and see what was wrong. He went. The boy was told to hitch on to the log, when defendant said if he did he (deft) would "blow your d—— brains out." The boy being afraid would not pick up the chain and make it fast to the tree. Plaintiff said he would do it, and as he stooped to pick up the chain defendant took a revolver out of his pocket, when the boy called out, "don't, father, he's going to shoot you!" On looking up he saw defendant with the revolver. The defence asked a few questions as to the neighborly feeling existing between the persons interested when the fact was elicited that defendant "had not neighbored" with plaintiff for the past four or five years, the reason for which no excuse could be offered. Defendant was fined $20 and costs, and bound over for twelve months to keep the peace.

Gone to England.

Mr. and Mrs. James Beecroft, of Flesherton, took train at the C. P. R. station, en route for England, last week. We trust our esteemed citizens will have a pleasant trip and that Mr. Beecroft return to Flesherton completely restored to health.

Curry's Little Joke.

One of the most popular mail carriers in Grey, is Mr. James Curry of Epping, Euphrasia. His route to Flesherton at this particular season of the year is rather a ticklish one at best. Tuesday last the Agricultural Editor accosted him:—

"How are the roads?"

"Oh not bad," replied Mr. Curry.

"A friend of mine is going down to Kimberley: can he get down alright?" asked the A. E.

"Oh, yes," replied Mr. C. with great frankness, "he can get down—in the snow!"

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

We Want a Bank.

A good Banking institution of some sort is wanted in Flesherton. We do not know of a better centre outside the county town. Durham has a branch of a chartered bank, and yet it is not nearly so good a centre for a large banking business as Flesherton. Thornbury, Hanover, Meaford, Dundalk, Markdale and other small places also boast of banking facilities.

Cutting Box Accident.

Walter Mitchell—youngest son of the ex-bailiff of Thornbury Div. Court—met with a bad accident on Saturday last. He was doing some work in connection with a cutting box, when his arm accidentally came in contact with the rapidly revolving knives. Nearly all the flesh on the lower part of the arm, from the hand to the elbow, was cut off close to the bone, when he was opportunely rescued. Otherwise he would, no doubt, have been much more terribly lacerated than he was, as the knives were drawing the limb into the machine.

Flesherton Roller Mill.

Our Roller Mill, under the efficient management of Mr. Wm. Bradley, is now in full blast, and turning out a very superior class of flour. Besides the Rollers, this mill is equipped with all the latest improvements for the manufacture of the best brands of flour. There is a steady and extensive rush of custom work, and trade is rapidly developing and returning to its natural channel. But there is a mischievious spirit of unfair opposition abroad which it is necessary to correct. As an instance, it has been rumored that 12 lbs. of toll per bushel have been taken from grists brought to the Mill. This is emphatically incorrect, the toll only being a little over half that amount, viz., seven pounds per bushel. The statement that there is no bran returned, is equally incorrect. A trial will convince any man, that Flesherton Roller Mill is conducted upon sound and honorable business principles.

DESCRIPTION.—Pleasing, soothing, healing, relieving, curing, is the description of Nasal Balm, which is receiving a national reputation as a cure for Catarrh. Cold in the Head, Hay Fever, etc.

Before I Die.

There are some things I fain would view
Before I die,
And one is that dear sunny land—
Fair Italy.
This restless spirit drinks, in thought,
Her glory in,
And feasts upon her varied charms,
Though all unseen.

There are some things I fain would touch
Before I die,—
The hand of one beloved friend
Who is not nigh.
In dreams alone I feel that clasp—
So real it seems!—
I wake to feel the mockery
Of idle dreams.

There are some things I fain would hear
Before I die;
A favorite, lingering softened strain
Of melody.
This weary spirit longs for peace—
For rest I cry;
Oh; Let me, Heaven, taste of these
Before I die.

Ontario W. C. T. U.

We have received a letter from the Superintendent of the Ontario W. C. T. U. Press Department, Miss Jennie Harrison, in which a number of questions are asked, and amongst others, the following:—"Will you grant the W. C. T. U. a space for original or selected items?" The same question was asked us a year or so previous, we answered in the affirmative, but never received any further information from the "Press Dept." until this week. However, our local W. C. T. U. has been using our space with good effect for some time, which we presume will be quite satisfactory to the provincial Union.

He Didn't Swear.

It thawed considerably on Monday and Tuesday and the streets were slippery. A stranger started to walk across one part of Collingwood street which was particularly smooth and treacherous. He was was whistling a cheerful little tune, when his feet suddenly shot out in front of him and his coat tails took and upward turn. It chanced that there was more than ice where he sat down, and when he got up on his feet again he managed, by putting his neck out of joint, to get a glimpse of the rear portion of his person. A frown passed over his forehead, but just then a lady passed and a sweet sad smile passed over his face. "D— it!" I came nearly swearing—and such a stunning pretty girl, too!" he muttered.

Died.

HALL.—In Thornbury, on the 14th inst., Ephraim Ashton, second youngest son of James and S. J. Hall, aged 8 years.

[Deceased was a nephew of the Editor of THE ADVANCE.]

"No, madame; I'm sorry I cannot show you any Spring Dress Goods—in fact I've gone into the Cabinet Making Business exclusively; but I can recommend you to a first-class dry goods firm, Richardson & Co., of Flesherton, where you can get everything you want in the dry goods line, and their Spring Dress Goods Stock is simply superb. The Home Fairy.

"I wish my fairy would come to-day
And brush the dust from these rooms away

"The cobwebs, too, on the ceiling high
Might trails with never a fly—

"How horrid they look! Upon my life,
The torment of every tidy wife."

"I wish my fairy her place would take
In the kitchen and let me see her bake

"For I'm so weary, I really dread
The thought of kneading a batch of bread."

Her husband heard her wish that day,
But, scarcely heeding it, hurried away

At night he locked the office door
And gladly entered his home once more

As round the cozy room he glanced,
His eyes with pleasure fairly danced.

The fire-dogs, of polished brass,
For lustre rivalled gold almost would pass

His easy chair was in its place—
Beside it beamed a smiling face.

No wonder that he turned to her,
His wife, husband and half worshipper,

And said, "Some fairy has had full sway
In every nook of our house to-day."

For gotten were dust and cobwebs high,
And there was light in somebody's eye.

For the heaviest tasks that burden a wife
Grow light when they brighten another's life.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"But if any one sees you!" Shirley said, faintly

"Then I have met you, and am seeing you home! My dear little girl, they can hardly be angry with you for accepting the simplest courtesy in the world."

Shirley said no more. She was physically and mentally exhausted with the strain that she had endured all the afternoon, and in her heart she was relieved not to have to go up the dark dreary avenue alone

When they reached the great iron gates leading into the Fairholme grounds Sir Hugh pulled up and sprung down from the dog-cart.

"Wait for me here, Latreille," he said, as he lifted Shirley down with the careful tenderness which distinguished his manner toward her. "Keep Tippoo moving," he added, as Shirley hastened on. "By the bye, did you find that note?"

"Yes Sir Hugh," Latreille answered quietly and his master hastened after Shirley and gently forced her to accept the support of his arm as they went up the drive together

"The hall door is open," Shirley said, tremulously, as they came in view of the house. "Uncle Gilbert is sure to be about somewhere: I must bid you good-bye. Please leave me now, Sir Hugh," she added earnestly. "Good-bye, and thank you."

The deep passionate gratitude in her voice brought a flush to Sir Hugh's face as he took both her hands in his.

"My dearest," he said, softly, "if you know how happy you have made me. Nay, do not shrink from me, Shirley. I have the right now, and I will keep it. Good-night my wife!"

He stooped toward her, putting his lips to her cheek for a moment, and then, without giving her time to remonstrate, he turned away and walked quickly down the avenue.

Angry, wounded, and terrified, Shirley fled onward to the house, and, reaching the hall in safety, stood leaning breathlessly against the table, physically unable to proceed any further. Even the sound of her uncle's footstep on the steps without could not give her power to move; and, when Sir Gilbert came in, she was still in the same attitude, supporting her against the feeling of faintness which was quickly creeping over her.

"Shirley," Sir Gilbert said, sternly, "this is strange conduct. Where did you spend the afternoon?"

"I went to the Manse," Shirley found voice to answer.

"To the Manse! Humph! Who accompanied you home? Was that Sir Hugh I saw going down the avenue?"

"Yes—he—I—"

Shirley made a desperate effort to answer, but her strength failed her, the excitement and fatigue of the afternoon had drained all her force. She managed to reach a chair, and then—doing the very best thing she could have done to avoid further questioning and reproof—she fainted quietly away.

CHAPTER XVI.

A lawyer's private room has nothing very dramatic or romantic in its general appearance, and yet how many a romantic and dramatic story is told within its four walls! Most lawyers are unexcitable, sensible, matter-of-fact, hard-headed men, and yet how many strange confidences they receive! How often are their words looked for with eager expectation, and how often do their decisions bring either despair and anguish or joy and gratitude to the aching hearts which throb so fast when they enter the dingy-looking office!

Mr. Duncan's private room was by no means an exception to the prevailing rule. It was a stern uncompromising-looking apartment, but sufficiently comfortable, especially when, as now, there was a blazing coal-fire in the grate; and, if its walls could have spoken, they might have told many a story of strange import.

For Mr. Duncan was the most eminent lawyer in the capital town of Perth, a man well known as clever, shrewd, and honorable, a very distinguished member of the legal profession. He was a cold-mannered, stern-looking man, who never allowed his feelings to sway him in any way in business; and, although he was one of kindest of husbands and most indulgent of fathers, to his clients he was invariably cold, distant, and courteous, and a man of very few words.

He was glancing over the letters which had been received by the afternoon's post one cold day early in January—the day after Shirley Ross had met her brother at the Half-moon Inn at Dumfife—when a clerk knocked at the door, and, on receiving permission to enter, handed Mr. Duncan a card, saying that the gentleman was waiting.

"It is past the hour for receiving clients," Mr. Duncan said, as he took the card and glanced at it.

"I told the gentleman so, sir; but he begged that you would make an exception in his favor, he would not detain you long, and his business is of importance."

Mr. Duncan considered a moment.

"Show him in," he said quietly.

A minute later Sir Hugh Glynn entered the room, and Mr. Duncan received him with his most professional face, but with all the courtesy due to such a distinguished visitor.

Sir Hugh explained the cause of his visit in so few words and in such a frank manly manner that Mr. Duncan was favorably impressed; his business related, he said, to a question with regard to the Scottish law of marriage; and he proceeded quietly to recite his story.

Mr. Duncan listened in silence, making no comment whatever until it was ended.

"Am I to understand," he asked then, "that the gentleman wishes to marry another woman, and not the lady he took to the inn?"

"You may understand so," Sir Hugh said, with a little smile. "Is he at liberty to do so?"

"He had better not," Mr. Duncan answered quietly; and a sudden gleam of eager delight flashed into the handsome blue eyes watching the lawyer's face.

"You think then that a marriage has taken place?" Sir Hugh interrogated eagerly.

"I think there is very strong evidence in favor of marriage," was the quiet answer.

"What would be the result of such a case, were it brought before the law courts?" asked Sir Hugh.

"It is impossible to say."

"But you can give me an opinion, Mr. Duncan, which I would regard as decisive."

Mr. Duncan was not proof against the flattery which the words and voice expressed so delicately.

"My own opinion is that the lady and gentleman who went to the hotel together and passed there as man and wife are married; but, I tell you frankly, that any of my colleagues might differ from it," he replied.

"Has any similar case been brought under your notice, Mr. Duncan?"

"Yes; but they are not frequent."

"Have they been made public?"

"Occasionally."

"With what result?" Sir Hugh asked, with an intense eagerness which did not escape the lawyer's quick eyes.

"There are no very recent cases, I believe," he said calmly; "but the judgment has almost invariably been in favor of the marriage."

"Thank you. Would a proof in writing in any way affect the question?" inquired the baronet.

"Materially," answered the man of law.

"Will you kindly look at these?"

As he spoke Sir Hugh handed to the lawyer two small sheets of paper, each bearing a few words, and one rather creased, as if it had been crumpled by an impatient hand. Mr. Duncan looked at them keenly, and when he turned to Sir Hugh there was a light of comprehension in his glance which had not been there before.

"That settles the case, Sir Hugh. In face of such evidence, I do not think any court would give a decision against there having been a marriage. I do not say," he continued smiling, "that the law of this land is irreproachable, but it remains the law."

"Even when consent has not been interchanged?"

"Even so," Mr. Duncan answered quietly, going to his bookshelves and taking down a book, which he opened and the pages of which he scanned rapidly; "although, in the present instance," he continued, with a slight smile and a quick glance at the handsome face of his client, "I should think consent had been interchanged. If it has not, it will not alter the case. An eminent judge, in a comparatively recent judgment, has declared that 'consent makes marriage,' but he adds that there may be unquestionably a marriage where in point of fact consent has never been interchanged, and when the parties do not even know that the law holds them to be married persons."

Sir Hugh rose from his seat and took up his hat and cane.

"I am much obliged to you, Mr. Duncan," he said cordially. "You have relieved my mind of a great weight. I have been suddenly called abroad by my mother's illness, and I did not know whether I was leaving my wife behind or not. I shall know how to act now."

"Are you leaving Scotland to-day?" Mr. Duncan asked.

"Yes; I am on my way to town now. I will look in upon you upon my return, Mr. Duncan; and may I beg that you will consider yourself my legal adviser in the future. I am almost a stranger to this country," he added, smiling. "Until my old uncle left me Maxwell I knew merely what I managed to find out during my yearly grouse-shooting visits. Good-afternoon. Do not trouble yourself, I beg."

Mr. Duncan, standing at the door of his private room, watched him go, and then turned back into his office, with a rather puzzled look upon his face. He was somewhat interested in his client, and he would have been glad to know all the particulars of the case that had been laid before him. In all probability it would be brought before his notice before long, he thought, as he inducted himself into his great-coat and prepared for his cold walk home, and in this opinion he was not mistaken.

Meanwhile Sir Hugh, wrapped in his fur coat, was speeding southward as fast as the "Mad Scotchman" could take him; and, as he leaned back in his corner of the luxurious first-class carriage, he was smiling to himself at the success of his treachery.

It cost him much to leave Scotland just now; he was longing to see Shirley again and win her love. Now that the law of the land had made her his wife, he would be so tender with her, he would love her so dearly, he would load her with such costly gifts that he could not fail to win her affection at last, and she would forgive the stratagem for the sake of such love. All was fair in love and war, and he could plead ignorance of the law which had given her to him, and so disarm her anger.

But all this must be put away for the present. His mother, Lady Glynn, was lying seriously ill at Cannes, and he must go to her at once. Of course he would write to Shirley from there and prepare her for the denouement. He would be very penitent and sorrowful for the error into which he had led her, but he would plead the impossibility of breaking off the marriage and the advisability of "making the best of it."

He quailed a little at the thought of Guy Stuart's rage and despair when he found his darling stolen from him; but Sir Hugh was physically no coward, and he felt he could protect his own. Besides, it might not be impossible to induce Guy, who was naturally passionate and jealous, to believe in Shirley's participation in and consent to the visit to Dumfife and its consequences, in which case he could blame no one but himself for believing in the truth of a girl unworthy of his faith. There were a hundred ways of getting out of the difficulty, he thought, as they sped on through the gathering wintry dusk. At any rate Shirley was his, and no one could take her from him. She was his wedded wife.

Meanwhile, at Fairholme Court, Shirley Ross was quite unconscious of the terrible labyrinth of difficulty and misery into which her unconscious little feet had wandered. She had escaped all further questioning from her uncle by that opportune fainting-fit, from which she revived to find herself in her own room, with Alice in attendance, bathing her head with eau de Cologne and holding strong salts to her nostrils.

Miss Fairholme seemed to give little heed to Shirley's faint apologies. With her a short swoon was not a matter of such importance as to cause any comment. Shirley was a little overtired, she fancied; she had been doing too much, and had paid the penalty. Alice shook up the pillows of the sofa on which her cousin lay, and made her drink some wine, and smilingly told her that she must not have such pale cheeks when Guy came back; and Skirley sunk into a heavy slumber of exhaustion, feeling almost passionately grateful for her cousin's kindness. But Alice had always been kind to her since her engagement.

The next morning when Shirley awoke, there was a bright sun shining and a clear blue sky overhead.

She hurried through her dressing with the thankful thought that all was well with Jack, and went down to breakfast feeling brighter than she had felt since the night of the ball. Her uncle and Lady Fairholme were in the dining-room, and they greeted Shirley with far more eagerness than usual; and Sir Gilbert immediately imparted to her the pleasing intelligence that Mr. Leeson, Jack's employer, had written, offering to make Jack the manager of the establishment at Calcutta, provided he could arrange to start almost immediately.

"It is a splendid opening for Jack," said Sir Gilbert, excitedly; "and I must write to him not to hesitate."

"You ought to be rejoiced at your brother's good fortune, Shirley," remarked Lady Fairholme, kindly; while Shirley looked very pale and bewildered and startled. "Of course it will be a great disappointment to you not to have him present at your wedding, but you must not be selfish, you know, my dear child."

Shirley smiled faintly. She selfish where Jack was concerned! That was impossible!

"I will write this morning to Jack, to say that he must accept and agree to whatever conditions Mr. Leeson chooses to make," said Sir Gilbert, presently. "You had better write a few lines also, Shirley, and congratulate your brother."

"Very well, Uncle Gilbert, I will write this morning."

"You are a good child," said Lady Fairholme, smiling; "and here is your reward," she added, handing her a letter in Guy's well-known handwriting.

Shirley took the letter eagerly just as Alice entered, and Lady Fairholme turned to her.

"Your papa has had a note from Sir Hugh, Alice," she said. "He is obliged to start for Cannes to-day, being called away by Lady Glynn's illness. He sends kindest regards for you, dear."

"I wonder how long he will be away," Alice returned, as she sat down to her breakfast with a heavy shadow on her fair face.

And Shirley, although she said nothing, wondered also.

CHAPTER XVII

"It is of no use glancing at that unfortunate time-piece every five minutes, Shirley, my child. It won't go a bit faster even under the fire of your bright eyes; and the train is not due at Dumfife for two good hours yet, which means that it will probably get there before the next three!"

Shirley laughed merrily.

"You do not seem to have a very good opinion of the punctuality of the cross-line, Ruby."

"No, I have not, my dear," answered Miss Capel, warmly, raising her arms behind her head in an attidude which showed her pretty figure to much advantage as she leaned back in the low chair in which she was sitting. "I have a vivid recollection of waiting nearly an hour at Weldon myself yesterday; and I am afraid they won't be the least bit punctual now, lassie, although they carry your bridegroom."

"But I am sure, if they knew how impatiently Shirley was waiting, they would put on extra steam," said Alice, lightly.

"I am sure also," Shirley agreed, gayly; "because the stoker may have a sweetheart somewhere; and he would no doubt sympathize with my impatience."

"And Guy's!" laughed Ruby.

"And Guy's, of course," said Shirley, resting her chin on the palm of her hand, and looking steadily into the fire, with a tender love-light in her eyes which made her more beautiful than ever.

It was a bitter winter afternoon, with a cold raw wind blowing and a gray lowering sky overhead. They had been watching the weather rather uneasily at Fairholme Court that day, for it was the eve of Shirley Ross' wedding-day, and every one was hoping that the sun would shine on the sweet young bride who was to leave Fairholme on the morrow.

A wedding in a house is always the occasion of more or less bustle; and, although Shirley had begged for a very quiet wedding, Sir Gilbert would not allow his niece to be married without due ceremony and a certain amount of eclat.

There were to be no guests present but Ruby Capel and her mother, no bridesmaids but Alice and Ruby and the two younger girls. Oswald had come up from Chatham for the occasion, and had brought a couple of friends to "enliven the girls," as he said. But the continued serious illness of old Sir Jasper Stuart made any festivities quite out of place; and Jack had sailed for India the week before, to Shirley's bitter disappointment.

Still the thought of seeing Guy so soon made every sad thought disappear like the snow before sunshine; and the beautiful young face was full of a certain softened happiness as Shirley sat looking into the fire, with her head resting against Ruby's knee as she sat on the rug beside her.

The girls were in Alice's pretty little sitting-room sipping their tea in cosy luxurious privacy after a busy day of last preparations for the wedding which made easy-chairs and the fragrant cups of tea very acceptable.

Ruby was avowedly lazy, lying back in her chair with her little slippered feet raised on the fender-stool. Shirley was stretched upon the rug nestling her pretty head against Miss Capel's knee; and Alice had taken possession of a lounging chair at the other side of the fire, and reclined there in perfect comfort.

"I wonder you have not coaxed Captain Fairholme into taking you to the station, Shirley," Ruby said lightly.

"Perhaps if you were to use your influence, it might have more effect," replied Miss Ross, wickedly; and Ruby's rich brown cheek colored brightly.

NEWSPAPERS.

A Prize Essay by an Albany Printer's Devil—Some Clever Characterizations.

The souvenir dancing orders of the Albany Printing Pressmen's Union contain the following contribution from "a printer's devil," which is too funny for publication in so-called comic papers; at least, they seldom have such genuine humor. It is entitled a "Prize Essay on Newspapers:"

Newspapers is called the vehicles of information.

Reporters is what is called "the staff"—so many of them being "sticks." They work hard—at refreshment bars.

Proof-readers is men what spoils the punctuation of compositors. They spell a word one way to-day and another way to-morrow. They think they be intelligent persons; compositors think different.

Compositors is men as sets up the types—and sometimes the drinks. Compositors is very steady men when they is sober—which they seldom is when they can help it.

Editors is men what knows everything in the heavens above and the earth beneath. They is writers who doesn't write anything whatsoever. They is the biggest men you ever see.

Managers is men as takes in the tin and gives patent medicine "ads" tops of columns next to reading matter thirty-seven columns out of thirty-two.

Proprietors an't anybody. They an't ever seen.

Printers' devils is the most important persons in a printin' office. They does the hardest work and gets the least pay.

Pressmen is—well, there wouldn't be no newspapers, no circus bills, without pressmen to print 'em.

Feeders is men what feeds on the fat of the land.

If I ever start a paper of my own I'll call it the Umbrella. Everybody will take it.

I heard the foreman tell this funny story to one of the "staff" the other day. It must have been funny, 'cause they both laughed. This is the story: "A gentleman was promenading the street with a little boy at his side when the little fellow cried out: 'O, pa, there goes an editor!' 'Hush, hush,' said the father, 'don't make sport of the poor man—God only knows what you may come to yet.'"

Self Massage for Dyspepsia.

This treatment requires much perseverance and practice, otherwise it may to some extent prove a failure; but renewed vigor will always be in proportion to the practice. Be not discouraged. First thing in the morning and last thing at night rub the abdomen down the left side and up the right in a round circle, also rub down the breast; now pace across the room once or twice, and then snap the lower limbs, like a whip lash, for exercise. Now twist the lower limbs, first on one side, then on the other, and rock up on the toes. Now for the lungs and abdomen; first, take in a half breath, then exhale all the air possible, then fill the lungs to their full capacity, walk across the room and back, at the same time throwing the arms back. Now in a half breath send out every particle of air till you see the abdomen working like a bellows, and you will soon become a deep breather. For more extended practice in deep breathing the morning before rising is a good time, provided there is full ventilation and that the air inside is as pure and fresh as that on the outside. Before a good fire wash the hands and face, wet the back of the neck, arms and lower limbs slightly, and rub down with a coarse towel. This is sufficient for a beginner, but entirely inadequate for the old, chronic dyspeptic.—J. N. Semple in Herald of Health.

The First and Greatest.

They have found the body of Alexander the Great. He was the original smart Alex.—Pittsburg Post.

Who would think of calling deaf men by beating a drum? Yet this is exactly what is done in the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb at Flint, Mich. With the drum resting on the floor and beaten in the usual way, everybody is awakened in the morning. It is also used to call the boys from the playgrounds. The teachers state that those who cannot hear at all feel the vibrations and answer the summons.

The village of Little Chute, near Neenah, Wis., is settled almost entirely by Hollanders, the majority of whom make their living by manufacturing wooden shoes, and all of whom wear them. Several times a year they have a dance, which lasts three days, and in which everybody joins, old and young. These dances are always held in the daytime, the people believing that dancing at night is immoral.

THE CANADIAN MORMONS.

Description of the New Mormon Settlement in the Northwest Territories—Irrigation of Crops—The Mormon Creed.

The Mormon settlement on Lees Creek, a tributary of the St. Mary's River, three miles above its junction, 40 miles south of Fort Macleod and 18 miles north of the international boundary line, is very prettily situated on both sides of the creek, in one of the finest ranching districts, both for agricultural and grazing purposes, to be found in the Northwest Territories. Their houses are entirely built of pine logs, roofed with rough lumber and covered to the depth of 4 or 5 inches with "sod;" indeed they are so neatly constructed as to put many of our western homes to shame. Seventy-six Mormons came in over land from Utah during the past summer, and very recently the number has been increased by two native born. Their journey was made in waggons and their arrival was at once marked by agricultural operations, which commenced almost the instant they arrived at their new home. Seeds of various kinds were sown, even to watermelons. Seeding over, attention was next turned to irrigation of their crops, which, under their experienced management, proved a great success. This, I believe, is the first instance in the territories of growing crops by irrigation, and although the summer of 1887 was not as droughty as the several preceding ones—the crops in general being very good—still, it is rare when grain can be raised successfully of the first breaking, and it is doubtful whether this could be done with resorting to artificial means. Irrigation perfected, their attention now turned to building, and timber being a scarcity, they were compelled to haul it from the mountains, a distance of some 30 miles. Erecting buildings, opening a coal mine, haying and harvesting employed their attention during the remaining portion of the season. Mr. C. O. Card, the elder of the church and chief of the settlement, is a very intelligent man. Mrs. Card, a daughter of the late Brigham Young, is accomplished and refined, and has proven quite an acquisition to the society of the Northwest. The Mormons, or "Latter Day Saints," are a people frugal, industrious, honest, entertaining the highest opinion of Canadians and of the law of the land. They do not preach nor practice "polygamy," nor do they intend to. Their religious worships (meetings and Sunday schools) are very instructive, and conducted in a manner similar to that of the Baptist denomination. The following are the articles of their faith. As there exists so much prejudice in the east against "Mormonism," I give them here so that they may unbias their opinions, to a certain extent regarding them.

ARTICLES OF FAITH.

1. We believe in God, the Eternal Father, and in His Son, Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost.

2. We believe that men will be punished for their own sins, and not for Adam's transgression.

3. We believe that through the atonement of Christ, all mankind may be saved, by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the Gospel.

4. We believe that these ordinances are: First, Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; second, Repentance; third, Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; fourth, Laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost.

5. We believe that a man must be called of God, by "prophecy, and the laying on of hands" by those who are in authority to preach the gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof.

6. We believe in the same organization that existed in the primitive church, viz., apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, etc.

7. We believe in the gift of tongues, prophecy, revelation, visions, healing, interpretation of tongues, etc.

8. We believe the Bible to be the word of God, as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the word of God.

9. We believe all that God has revealed, all that He does not reveal, and we believe that He will yet reveal many great and important things pertaining to the Kingdom of God.

10. We believe in the literal gathering of Israel and in the restoration of the ten tribes, that Zion will be built upon this continent, that Christ will reign personally upon the earth, and that the earth will be removed and receive its paradise glory.

11. We claim the privilege of worshipping Almighty God according to the dictates of our conscience, and allow all men the same privilege, let them worship how, where or what they may.

12. We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers and magistrates, in obeying, honoring and sustaining the law.

13. We believe in being honest, true, chaste, benevolent, virtuous, and in doing good to all men; indeed, we may say that we follow the admonition of Paul, "We believe all things, we hope all things," we have endured many things, and hope to be able to endure all things. If there is anything virtuous, lovely, or of good report or praiseworthy, we seek after these things. Here endeth the thirteen articles of the Mormon religion, what do you think of them?

In an interview with Mr. Card the other day, he said he was very favorably impressed with the Northwest. The soil was of the most extraordinary fertility, and the climate of unsurpassed salubrity. He thought the timber also was heavier and of better quality than in Utah.

I only speak of the Mormons as I find them, and thus far my social intercourse has been of the most pleasant character. Enough of Mormonism!

Lord Dufferin's Eyesight.

We regret to hear a rumor to the effect that the real reason why Lord Dufferin is returning prematurely from India is because his eyesight is failing. As Viceroy he has to read an immensity of official correspondence and minutes of every description. The strain upon the eyesight under the climatic conditions is so severe—so at least says a rumor current in influential circles yesterday—that in order to avert partial blindness it is necessary for him to leave India before the end of the year. We hope the story is ill-founded, but it reaches us from a quarter which forbids its dismissal as a mere idle tale.—Pall Mall Gazette.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

The debate on the inter-provincial resolutions was resumed.

Mr. Harcourt said that on many occasions conflicts had arisen between the Federal and Provincial authorities; it was also well known that often, when the interpretation of clauses of the B.N.A. Act had been sought before the courts, it had been found that they did not embody the intentions of those who had framed them. This being the fact, who could commend the course of the member for Loudon to remain content? Who, on the other hand, would not commend the course of the Government in seeking to make the constitution what it was intended it should be? The objects of these resolutions were to promote the interests of this Province and to promote the interests of the Dominion.

Mr. Meredith, on the division being called, said he understood the present motion was a mere statement that the resolutions had been passed at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Mowat—Yes.

The motion was then put and carried.

Hon. Mr. Mowat then moved concurrence in the resolutions.

Mr. Creighton said he supposed the Attorney-General had changed his base in the method of putting these resolutions, because he had found some of them were bitter pills to his followers. He proposed to remove the sugar coating with the following amendment:

"That all the words after 'that' in the original motion be struck out and the following substituted: 'That the proposed mode of dealing with the disallowance of provincial legislation involves the transfer to a body not responsible to the people of Canada of powers exercisable by a body which is responsible, and is otherwise objectionable and should not be adopted.'"

The House divided and the amendment was lost. Yeas, 30; nays, 54.

Mr. Wood (Hastings) moved in amendment, That the proposed plan for dealing with the constitution of the Senate of Canada does not afford a satisfactory solution of the objections urged to that body as it now exists under the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. Fraser moved in amendment to the amendment that all the words after "that" be struck out and the following inserted, That there be added these words to the original motion, that "an humble address be presented to the Lieut.-Governor and Secretary of State of Canada of the concurrence of the House in the said resolutions."

Mr. Ingram said they were debarred from giving their vote on the Senate resolution, and they were thus deprived of a right they should have.

Mr. Creighton said the Government presented the cowardly spectacle by their amendment of being afraid to let the minority record their votes on the merits of a particular resolution formulated by the conspiracy at Quebec. They had resorted to mean technicalities to avoid meeting the square issue, but he prophesied that the people would call them to account.

Hon. Mr. Fraser—Ha! ha! ha!

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was carried. Yeas, 54; nays, 30.

In reply to Mr. Meredith,

Mr. Speaker ruled that further amendment was precluded.

The original motion as amended was carried on the same division.

The Bill respecting the Department of Agriculture and other industries was passed through Committee of the Whole. The provision assigning certain duties to the new Minister of Agriculture, certain duties in connection with the fisheries, was struck out. In reply to Mr. Meredith the Hon. Mr. Mowat said the care of the mining interests would be transferred to the new department.

The Bill respecting the payment of the expenses and enforcement of the Canada Temperance Act (Mr. Hardy) was read the second time. Hon. Mr. Hardy explained that the Bill made the fines collected chargeable for the expenses, and they were to be exhausted before the Province was called upon to contribute its one-third of the costs

Mr. Meredith thought the amendment would make the Act more unpopular than ever in the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Ross (Huron) moved, That this House do ratify an order-in-council approved by His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor on the 2nd day of March, 1888, accepting from the city of St. Catharines municipal debentures of the city for the sum of $4,840, payable in five years, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent., payable half-yearly, in full settlement of the indebtedness of the city upon Municipal Loan Fund Debentures and Coupons now held by the Province.—Carried.

The House again went into committee of supply on the estimates.

On the vote of $135,631 for agriculture,

Hon. A. M. Ross said the Government had reduced the grant to the Provincial Agricultural Association from $10,000 to $4,500. The proposal was, af course, before the House for discussion.

Mr. Metcalfe thought that in justice to Kingston, which had expended a large sum of money in order to get the Provincial Fair this year, the grant should not be discontinued this session.

Mr. Wood thought that the grant might be continued this year with fair notice it would be discontinued hereafter.

Mr. Wilmot strongly supported the continuance of the grant for this year.

Mr. Drury defended the existence of the Provincial Fair, and deprecated its extinction. He believed the time would come when the farmer would insist upon having such an exhibition, but in the meantime the cities had the control of the fair grounds of the country and forced the Provincial out of existence.

It being 6 o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS,

Mr. Awrey said he thought the grant should be divided among the leading fairs of the Province, thus distributing the money and relieving the burdens of the local fairs and allowing the Provincial show to die painlessly and respectably. He thought, however, the grant should be given this year on Kingston's account, and on the understanding that this was the last time it would be given to the Provincial Fair.

Mr. Phelps said the people of Simcoe were opposed to the continuance of this grant. He had no objection to Kingston's getting the grant if this was to be the last of it.

Mr. Awrey said he would test the feeling of the House in concurrence by moving a rider to the effect that the grant was made for the last time.

Mr. Meredith said he thought for this year at least the grant should be given, as the impression was that the faith of the Province was pledged to Kingston. In any case they should not decide hastily as to the fate of the Provincial.

Hon. Mr. Ross (Huron) said that if it was found necessary to increase this year's grant so as to bring it up to last year's figures it would be provided for in the supplementary estimates. With regard to the future, if the Government discovered that it was the wish of the farmers of the Province that the grant should be continued that would be a matter for consideration.

Mr. Clancy requested that this reso ution be allowed to stand, which was agreed to.

Mr. Bishop moved the second reading of the Bill to regulate the width of sleighs to be used on public highways. It provides that county councils may pass by-laws that no vehicles upon runners, other than cutters or pleasure sleighs, shall be less than three feet nine inches wide between the runners.

Mr. Hudson was opposed to the provision of the Bill, but he would urge his objection before the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Fell thought this measure was going to be a nuisance to the councils.

The Bill was read the second time.

A Bill to amend the Act respecting the solemnization of marriage—Hon. Mr. Mowat.

An Act to amend the Act respecting benevolent and provident societies—Hon. Mr. Mowat.

An Act to amend the Act respecting the administration of justice in this Province—Hon. Mr. Mowat.

Mr. Hess, before the adjournment of the House, on behalf of the German population, moved a vote of sympathy with the German nation on the occasion of the death of the Emperor.—Carried.

Mr. French asked whether the attention of the Attorney-General has been drawn to the interpretation placed upon the words "occupied lands" in sub-section 1 of section 2 of the Line Fences Act, whereby, as contended by some County Court Judges in appeal, the whole Act is rendered nugatory, the object of the Act being manifestly to provide a means for fencing unenclosed lands, whereas by said sub-section, it is provided that the Act shall not apply to "unenclosed land." Is any remedy proposed?

Hon. Mr. Mowat stated that the question assumed what was not the fact; the County Court Judges appeared to have differed; but, even supposing the assumption to be correct, there would be still some parts of the Province where the Act would apply. However, if the Act was found to work unsatisfactorily, future legislation would be introduced.

Mr. Field moved for a return showing the amount received from poll tax in each city, town and village in the Province for 1886.

Carried.

Mr. McAndrew moved the second reading of Bill (No. 127) to amend the Act for the protection of game and fur-bearing animals, providing that no moose shall be hunted, taken or killed before the 15th October, 1890.—Carried.

Mr. Freeman moved the second reading of Bill (129) to regulate the sale of seed grain. It prohibits the sale of seed grain, etc., at more than three times the price of ordinary grain, under penalty of imprisonment not exceeding six months, with or without hard labor; it also provides, in addition to the above penalty, any person violating any of its provisions shall be liable to pay a sum of not less than $500 and not more than $1,000, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction by any person who may sue therefor.

Mr. Creighton questioned the power of the Legislature to regulate the sale price of any article; he considered it was an infringement on trade.

Hon. Mr. Fraser said that the objection he had to the Bill was that if it were good in principle it should cover more than seed grain. Why should a man be allowed to sell a horse at three times its value, and not allowed to sell a horse at three times its value, and not allowed to sell grain at the same rate?

Mr. Freeman said there could be no comparison; the value of grain was quoted every day in the papers; the value of a horse was what you could get for him.

Hon. Mr. Mowat, referring to the doubts expressed by Mr. Creighton as to the power of this Legislature to enact such laws, said he had no hesitation in saying it had that power. It had been asserted that the Dominion Parliament alone could deal with matters belonging to trade and commerce, but that assertion was wrong; that assertion had been argued before the Privy Council, which had held that the trade and commerce over which the Dominion Parliament had exclusive jurisdiction related to foreign and inter-provincial trade, and had nothing to do with any particular trade by itself. The only question therefore was whether the House should legislate on the matter. If it were tried to protect people from frauds of this kind, they should have to prevent frauds of every kind. This particular kind of fraud was a new device and had been practised in other countries, notably in Iowa and Michigan. In view of these facts he thought it was only reasonable the Bill should be allowed to go to the committee.

Mr. Meredith thought that the Bill should receive a second reading.

Mr. Wood (Hastings) moved the second reading of the Bill to provide for the incorporation of cheese and butter associations. He said it afforded a cheap and expeditious method of incorporation and its provisions were selected from the co-operative Bill. A number of persons, seven or more, had simply to sign a document stating they wished to form an association, attach the rules, make both out in duplicate and file one copy with the registrar.

Mr. Ballantyne said the Bill would be appreciated in the country.

The Bill was read the second time.

The Bill to amend the Assessment Act (Mr. Gilmour) was read the second time.

The House adjourned at 8.30 p.m.

A Sure Thing.

Higgins—Haw, Jack! can' ye tell me what's a good thing for a moustache?

Wiggins—Why, yes—hair.

THE CAYUGAS.

An Old Claim Now Being Pressed in New York.

GENERAL STRONG'S EFFORTS.

A Buffalo despatch to the New York Times says: The Bill that is now before the Legislature relative to the claim of those Cayuga Indians who reside in Canada is of the greatest interest. An outline sketch of the varied fortunes that have clung to this remnant of that nation known as the diplomatists of the great Iroquois Confederacy reads almost like an Oriental story. The expedition of General Sullivan to the western part of the State of New York in the year 1779 gave the finishing blow to the Six Nations' power in the United States. Many of them at once removed to Canada to join their brethren who had gone before, and among these was a very large contingent from the Cayugas.

The Cayuga Nation once occupied a large tract extending across New York State from Lake Ontario to Pennsylvania in the vicinity of Cayuga Lake. The nation had no particular use for the whole tract, and the encroaching whites undertook to dispossess them of a large part of it by purchase. Soon after the close of colonial times a treaty was made by the State with these Indians by which the land in question was transferred to the State, the price agreed upon being $240,000, but after a small part of the price was paid the Indians were persuaded that what they really wanted was not the whole money to squander, but a reasonable annuity that could neither be sold nor used up, so the aborigines consented to an annual payment of $2,300. This was all straightforward business, and there is no question about it so far.

But about the year 1789, when the Cayugas numbered not far from 1,000, a division took place among them and 800 went across Lake Ontario and settled in Canada. They were soon so attached to their new country that in the war of 1812 they joined the British and fought against their former neighbors. But in the treaty of Ghent, at which peace was arranged between the two countries, it was agreed that the Canadian Cayugas should be given back their former privileges. The points were raised, however, that the real Cayuga nation was that which remained in New York; that the tribal basis and not the individual one should be recognized, and that the payment of the annuity should be made to the tribe as a whole and no broken parts should be recognized. As some of these Indians have gone west and settled, the individual claim becomes a difficult one to settle. Moreover, the annuity of $2,300 has been regularly paid in full to the New York branch of the creditors, who now number about 150.

In 1884 Gen. James C. Strong, of Buffalo, who had been made the attorney for the Canadian Cayugas, went to Albany. He took with him the original silver medal presented by George Washington in 1792 to the Cayuga Chief, Fish Carrier, as a token of his appreciation of the valor and services of the Cayugas in the Revolutionary war. It is well known that they fought side by side with our soldiers of that day against England's trained troops for the independence of the colonies. The medal is of solid silver, oval in shape. It measures seven inches in length and five inches in width. On one side is engraved an accurate likeness of George Washington placing in the mouth of the brave warrior, Fish Carrier, the lighted pipe of peace. At the foot of the red man lies a tomahawk, where he has thrown it in token of amity and friendship. Back of this scene is depicted a ploughman of the last century, ploughing the soil with a team of oxen and a rude wooden plough. On the other side of the medal is engraved the coat of arms of the United States. The medal is attached to a silk ribbon, which has encircled the neck of the brave Fish Carrier and many of his successors. Gen. Strong also took the original treaty between the State of New York and the Cayugas. The latter is a piece of deerskin parchment two feet wide and two and a half feet long. It was made July 27th, 1795, and contains the signatures of Philip Schuyler, then Secretary of State; John Canting, D. Brooks and John Richardson, Commissioners of State, and O-Ja-Gegh-Ti, or Fish Carrier, and Dse-Nou-Tawe-Khon, a chief. It also contains the signatures of two interpreters and sixteen sachems. The treaty conveys, for a consideration of $38,334, all the land then owned by the Cayugas, except two very small tracts. One of these was reserved to Fish Carrier personally. This amount was to remain in the State Treasury, and the interest, $2,300, was to be paid June 1st every year to the tribe as long as it existed. The sale made the Cayugas homeless in the United States.

"This annuity," said Commissioner Strong in a recent interview, "was paid for 14 years after the treaty, and receipted on the back as provided. Meanwhile and prior to the payment of 1810 a question was raised by some State officer. It seems that before the treaty was made in 1795, at a place then known as Cayuga Ferry, a large number of that tribe had taken up homes in Canada. G-Ja-Gegh-Ti, or Fish Carrier, the head chief, with another large portion, including all the sachems, afterward went to Canada. Thus, three-quarters of the tribe made their home there. When the treaty was made the Canada band was sent for to join in the sale and conveyance. They were recognized then. The quaint document has been kept by the Wolf clan of the Cayuga nation until deposited by me in the Buffalo Safe Deposit Company's vaults some years ago. The medal given by Washington's hand to Fish Carrier has been kept most sacredly until brought by their chief in person. The question which arose as mentioned is: Whether the Indians are still entitled to the annuity while living in Canada—a very puerile excuse for not keeping a contract. No parallel case could be cited; so the matter remained unsettled for two years, and the Indians received no money. Meanwhile the war of 1812 broke out. The Indians felt aggrieved, were easily induced to side with England, and knew it was hopeless to urge their claim after that act. Nevertheless, the treaty of Ghent of Dec. 24th, 1814, stipulates that the United States must 'put an end immediately after the ratification of the present treaty to hostilities with all the tribes or nations of Indians with whom they may be at war at the time of such ratification, and forthwith to restore to such tribes or nations respectively all the possessions, rights and privileges which they may have enjoyed or been entitled to in 1811, previous to such hostilities.' This, it would seem, ought to have settled the matter and restored the claimants to their rights. The State paid the $2,300 to the Cayugas who remained in the United States. They were asked to pay it to the whole tribe, but the public officers shared the same feeling, under the frivolous pretext that paying the Indians in the United States was paying the Cayuga Nation, of which there were over 1,000 in Canada. The Cayugas in this country would do all they could to keep along such a feeling because it added to their purse. The claimants had no 'friend at court, so that 39 years passed before they were able to get even a partial hearing. They tried several times, but met with only rebuff."

In answer to General Strong's mission in 1884, the commissioners of the land office decided that it was not competent to act in the matter. The Court of Claims and the Attorney-General had already decided against him. He then took the case into the Supreme Court and asked a mandamus to compel the payment of the claim and this was denied. The case was taken into the Special Term and an adverse decision was given by Justice Peckham. General Strong carried it to the General Term, and he was sustained. The State then appealed to the Court of Appeals and the decision was that the courts had no jurisdiction.

The next point of attack was the Legislature. In 1887 two Bills were introduced in both Houses, one for the payment of back annuities to the Canadian Cayugas and the other providing for a commission to determine the quota and the methods of distributing the Canadian's share in the future. These bills were not passed. This year Gen. Strong has once more arrived in Albany with his medals and treaty to urge the passage of a Bill naming one commissioner to hear all sides of the question and to make a fair division of the annual moneys. He is to have power to treat with the Cayugas subject to revision and approval by the Governor of New York. As the claim for $400,000 back pay has been dropped, the prospect of passing the Single Commissioner Bill just noted appears to be very good.

HE HUGGED BOTH THE GIRLS.

And the Embrace Cost a Harvard Senior Just Thirty Dollars.

A Boston despatch says: Wednesday evening, just before midnight, two Harvard College seniors, who had been out on a little "lark," stepped into the doorway of a bake shop on Harvard street, Cambridge, to light their cigars. One was Lloyd McKee Garrison, of Orange, N. J., a grandson of William Lloyd Garrison, of abolition fame, and the other was Henry Clarke, of Cambridge. While they waited two girls came along.

"Hello, sissy," cried one of the seniors.

The girls giggled.

"Say, girls you are out late and in danger of getting kissed."

The girls tee-heed.

"If you don't stop laughing I'll hug you both," said Garrison.

"You can't do it," was the reply.

At this Garrison ran out and forcing himself between the girls hugged them both until they cried for help. Two policemen then appeared, and Garrison seeing them relinquished his hold and sought to retreat. The officers captured him before he had taken many steps,

To-day he appeared before a Magistrate. The girls, who are servants in a Cambridge family, were present, all blushing with confusion.

"Was this the man who assaulted you?" asked the Judge.

"We were not assaulted, sir; he did not hurt us a bit."

"But did this man hug you?"

"Y-e-s, sir."

Garrison pleaded guilty to the offence, and was fined $30 and costs. He paid his fine, bowed and went out. When asked about his adventure Garrison said he was satisfied.

Welcome to Tenderfeet.

An Aberdeen (D.T.) hotel has conspicuously posted in its office a sign which reads as follows: "Any tenderfoot who calls a suet of rooms a sweet, or spitbox a cuspidoor, or lookin'-glass a mirror, cannot stop in this house, and will find the climit helthier further east."

Cunning Tommy.

"Good morning, Tommy; how is your mamma?"

"She's all right."

"Is that all you have got to say, Tommy?"

"If you'll give me a piece of cake I'll say 'thank you.'"

He Could Imagine It.

"Did you read about that cyclone in Illinois?"

"Yes. It must have been a horrible affair!"

"Did you ever see a cyclone?"

"No, but I can imagine what it would be like."

"How?"

"My wife has three sisters visiting her."

What's in a Name?

Rev. Mr. Bacchus is conducting a big temperance meeting in Laurel, Del. The Rev. Mr. Smoke has opened somewhere in this big country a crusade against smoking, and the Rev. Mr. Husband, of England, has declared that preachers should not marry. Who says this is a prosaic world?—Savannah News.

Titles of Place and Distinction.

"In Kentucky they call you 'colonel;' in Indiana ''Squire' is a complimentary salutation. They hail the stranger as 'Governor' in Kansas, and when you get off the train at Salt Lake City the hotel agent shouts: 'This way, Bishop! Second 'bus on the left.'" By the time you reach Los Angeles you have lost all the titles, and your name is simply Dennis.—Burdette.

The House of Death.

[This exquisite poem is founded on a passage in "Castilian Days," by Colonel John Hay, where he speaks of the Spanish custom of closing a house whence one well beloved has been carried, locking its doors and leaving it as the monument of the dead that had been so dear until it too shall crumble into dust and be dead.]

Not a hand has lifted the latchet
Since she went out of the door—
No footstep shall cross the threshold
Since she can come in no more.

There is rust upon locks and hinges
And mould and blight on the walls,
And silence faints in the chambers
And darkness waits in the halls—

Waits as all things have waited
Since she went, that day of spring,
Borne in her pallid splendor
To dwell in the Court of the King

With lilies on brow and bosom,
With robes of silken sheen,
And her wonderful frozen beauty
The lilies and silk between.

Red roses she left behind her,
But they died long, long ago—
'Twas the odorous ghost of a blossom
That seemed through the dusk to glow.

The garments she left mock the shadows,
With hints of womanly grace,
And her image swims in the mirror
That was so used to her face.

The birds make insolent music
Where the sunshine riots outside
And the winds are merry and wanton
With the summer's pomp and pride.

But into this desolate mansion
Where Love has closed the door,
No sunshine nor summer shall enter
Since she can come in no more.

WEATHER PREDICTIONS.

Professor Carpmael on the Practice of Weather Prophesies.

Professor Carpmael (Obi Probs) lectured last night in the Natural History Rooms, on "Weather Prediction." Sir William Dawson presided. The lecturer said many of the weather saws were based on the appearance of the clouds, meteorologic phenomena and the behavior of certain animals and birds. Close observation of the weather day by day showed that a connection existed between the general weather and the direction of the wind, and if the direction of the wind could always be known this would aid in the forecasting. There were two ways in which a body at rest may be set in motion or its velocity changed by pushing or pulling. Large quantities of fluid were "pulled" by attraction. The moon had the greatest pulling influence over the earth, but it was slight, and it was therefore evident that the movements of the air must be due to a "pushing" force in the air between two points. This is measured by barometric pressure and the phenomenon of the gravitation of the earth on the atmosphere watched. If the difference in barometric reading between two points was very great the greater became the velocity of the air. Owing to the rotation of the earth the air was deflected to the right in the northern hemisphere and to the left in the southern. The lecturer explained by charts the tendencies of storms. Most of them arose in the west, sweeping in a varying direction from Lake Superior to the Gulf of Mexico. The eccentric course of cyclones was then entered into, and Mr. Carpmael showed that if the changes in the distribution of atmospheric pressure could be accurately foretold, and their course be noted, the success on of changes of weather could be foretold with a considerable degree of certainty, but as this was not always possible, as all the causes of cyclones were not at present known, weather predictions could therefore only be "probabilities" and never certainties.

Montreal Star of Friday.

Very Business-like.

"Are you in earnest, Mr. Hankinson?"

The girl who asked this simple question of Marcellus Hankinson sat behind the centre table with her hands in her lap and regarded the young man intently.

"In earnest, Irene?" he exclaimed, pale with emotion and chronic dyspepsia; "the whole happiness of my life is wrapped up in your answer to the question I have asked. If you will trust your future in my hands my life shall be devoted to the task of making you happy. It will be my sole aim to shield you from the rude blasts of all adversity, to smooth your pathway through the world, to interpose my right arm between you and every danger that threatens to disturb your peace, and ——"

"If I listen to your suit, Mr. Hankinson," interrupted the young lady, casting her eyes with some timidity and confusion to the floor, "you may regret it some day. You would find me ignorant of the practical duties of housekeeping, and without ——"

"Practical duties of housekeeping!" broke in the enthusiastic youth: "you will have no practical duties of that kind. As my wife you shall not be a drudge. You shall be the queen of my home. You consent, do you not, my dar——"

"Wait a moment, my dear Mr. Hankinson. I am afraid you would find me thoughtless and extravagant in a great many things."

"Extravagant! Irene, it will be the joy of my life to provide you with whatever may gratify your slightest whim. You can never make a request of me that I would not rejoice to anticipate and grant beforehand."

"And you would be willing to spend all your evenings at home?"

"My angel, I never would want to spend them anywhere else."

"You would never break my heart by joining a disreputable club or becoming a drinking man?"

"Hear me, Irene! I promise never to do either!"

"Let me see," said the young lady, meditatively; "I think that is all—O! You will agree to have the word 'obey' left out of my part of the marriage service, will you, Mr. Hankinson?"

"Obey! Ha! ha! Why, my own, certainly. I am even willing to promise to obey you!"

"Then, Marcellus," said the lovely girl, as she lifted a full-grown phonograph off her lap, locked it carefully in a drawer of the secretary that stood against the wall, turned up the gas, and beamed in a sweet yet business-like manner upon the terror-stricken young man, "I am yours!"

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The manly form and smiling countenance of Assessor McLaughry can be seen now-a-days on our streets and highways, as he goeth forth from house to house in the performance of his duties as a Township official. The position of Assessor is a responsible and important one, and it must be frankly conceded, that the mantle has fallen upon worthy shoulders in the person of Mr. McLaughry.

"See here, old chap," said a friend to the Editor of this paper the other day, "You talk of Markdale dropping from a town to a village, but you forget, that, without incorporation, Flesherton is merely a country cross-roads—a part and a parcel of the Township of Artemesia!" Yes, sir, we see the point clearly; but mine honest friend, Flesherton prefers to be part of a large and populous Township, with some thousands of people within its limits, to the questionable dignity of a one-horse municipality. We can also see another point, viz., that these petty corporations have a wonderful knack of adding to the burden of taxation.

Mr. Robert Myles, ex-Reeve, is airing himself through the public press at the expense of members of Euphrasia township Council. It may be that Mr. Myles considers he is performing a public duty, but most people can discover a motive in his not being reappointed Assessor. This latter appears the more likely reason, when we remember his tardiness in exposing the so-called illegalities until after the appointment of his successor.

THE WORLD.

It seems to me that the world lacks several squares of being round. Not that I ever measured it to see. I'm not that kind of a navigator. But I judge this to be so from the people I come in contact with. They are always running it down and heaping coals of scorn and abuse on it. If somebody acts in a real wicked way, the blame is attached to the world. If a fellow drinks concatinated essence of water and something else, the world catches it hot. If he doesn't attend prayer meeting, he's called worldly. If he likes to make money and pay his debts, and doesn't go regularly to the meeting house, the wise ones solemnly shake their noddles and sadly remark—"Ah! the world has got a terrible hold on him, poor fellow!" The boss says he wishes there were more worldings like the last chap than there are. Them's my sentiments, too, but I can't help thinking, from all I hear, that the world must be a little off somewhere or there wouldn't be so many people down on it.

THE CARNIVAL.

A spanking team from Elder's livery conveyed several of our boys to Markdale on Friday night. As they passed THE ADVANCE office, Shaw sang out to the boss:—"If you put this in the paper I'll—" I didn't catch the balance of his speech, but the boss concluded not to say a word about it in THE ADVANCE. Says he to me—"Them fellows are going to the carnival at Markdale. They got fooled the night of the big storm, for when they got to the village, they found the carnival had been postponed until to-night! Guess we'd better say nothing." "You're right, boss," says I, "we wont!" We heard afterwards that the boys captured about half a dozen prizes, Booth the boss barber getting two, one being for a big head. Next day Booth told me his head felt big enough to take another prize—his own head I mean.

THE PATHMASTERS.

Wm. Clayton and Peter Holman are the Pathmasters for Flesherton this year. Privately, I'd like to be one myself; but then you know we can't all be officers, for where would the other fellows come from? Besides, the boss said I'd be putting sidewalks all 'round my corner lot and levelling the backyard, and turnpiking the road, and digging drains, which wouldn't be right, he says. I didn't like such talk—even from the boss! If it had been anybody else I'd have knocked him down—provided he had been a smaller man than myself! I hate plain talk like that. It isn't polite, and besides its foolish.

BEECHEL STREET.

This street runs from the corner of Blakely Bros. butcher shop to the Baptist chapel. It is much travelled. I walked down on it several times myself, and a friend of mine, who owes some little bills in the West End of the town, frequently brought loads of grain to a certain place, via Beechel Street, during the past few weeks. My friend, Samuel Kingston, lives on it—in fact he's been there not many years short of a quarter of century. "Samuel," says I, "this is a fine street." "Yes," says he, "I've been payin' taxes on it this twinty years, but divil the cint will they lay out on it in improvements!" I became indignant. "Samuel," says I, "we'll smash the township into little bits if something isn't done this year!" And we will.

Orange Soiree at Eugenia.

The Orangemen of Eugenia and their many friends must have been gratified at the grand success which attended their annual soiree, held in their neat and attractive lodge room last Friday evening. The hall was packed to the doors, and the proceeds amounted to something in the neighborhood of $30. The room was handsomely decorated with banners and other attractive devices. A splendid repast was served up by our well known and popular caterer, Mrs. A. Thompson, after which our esteemed old friend, James Brodie, Esq., took his place as Chairman on the platform. The program was a very lengthy one and where all did so well, it would take more space than we have at command to particularize. We might say that following ladies and gentlemen—so far as our memory serves us—contributed to the enjoyment of the evening's entertainment:—The members of Eugenia Choir, under the efficient leadership of Mr. J. R. Hogg, accompanied on the organ by Mrs. J. R. Hogg; Mr. S. Clemis, Mr. Sloan, jr., Mr. F. T. Carr, Miss Carr, Master Carr, Mr. Bruce, Mr. W. T. Pedlar, Mr. Williams, Mr. J. G. Carson, A. R. Fawcett, and last, but not least, a stirring, out-and-out Orange oration by Rev. J. S. Corcoran. We have forgotten the name of the young man who so cleverly assisted Mr. Sloan jr., in the mouth organ duett; also the names of two of the colored gentlemen. Among the features of the evening ware the capitally rendered recitations by Mr. Bruce, who is an elocutionist of a high character. Another feature, was the solo part—in one of the pieces sung by the Choir—so charmingly rendered by Miss Beacock. But the entertainment was full of good features and thoroughly enjoyed by those present.

Kimberley Tea-meeting.

According to advertisement our annual church tea meeting was held on Thursday evening. All who were present appeared to be highly pleased with the evening's entertainment. The spread in the school-house spoke well for those who heated the ovens and needs not to be praised

Shortly after 8 p. m. the the literary part of the entertainment commenced. Squire Stewart was promoted the chair. As usual the chairman's speech was the first item on the programme. His remarks were very suitable and in length, contrasted strangely with the height of our esteemed friend.

Owing to the great storm some of the rev. gentlemen who were expected to be present, were unable to attend. Our pastor and the Rev. J. Hoskings delivered interesting addresses. Mr. J. R. Ellis and other local gentlemen also added to the success of the evening.

The selections of music rendered by the choir were listened to with much pleasure. Miss Thompson, the leader, certainly deserves praise for the able assistance which she has always given us in this department. The proceeds amounted to about Twenty-five Dollars.

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

The Late Mr. Crackanthorpe.

From the Cumberland & Westmorland (Eng.) Advertiser.

The death of Mr. Crackanthorpe, of Newbiggin Hall, which took place last week, has removed a striking figure and a unique and interesting personality from our midst. Mr. Crackanthorpe was a fine example of a type which is as some people profess to believe, getting rare amongst us. He was par excellence a "Fine old English gentleman." The heir at an early age of a considerable estate, he managed his private affairs throughout his long and blameless life with prudence unmixed with stinginess. An ardent Liberal politician from his youth upwards, he threw his whole heart and soul into the strife, and with burning zeal devoted his time, talents, and energies to the cause of his party. A country gentleman, with ample leisure, he took an active share in the public affairs of his county and district, discharging with exemplary regularity and conscientiousness, the duties of a magistrate, poor law guardian, &c. In his public life without reproach, and animated in all he did with the highest of motives, Mr. Crackanthorpe in his social and private relations also displayed all the best qualities of his race. He had considerable natural gifts, which were improved by education, and polished by reading and intercourse with persons of intellect, learning and literary tastes. With travel and his experience as a magistrate and poor law guardian, he acquired an intimate knowledge of human nature, and that he took a kindly and cheerful view of humanity, rather than a cynical and pessimistic one, is due to the admirable balance of his own character. Nor does this enumeration exhaust the list of Mr. Crackanthorpe's qualities. In benefactions to the deserving and opportune help to the young, the deceased was in his way a squire Allworthy in his district; and in his personal dealings with all classes, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, he was ever courteous, with a courtesy of the old-fashiond kind, for which our modern bustling times have no room, and affable with overflowing charity and good nature. He had lived to the patriarchal age of 98, esteemed by the public and revered by his friends, and his death makes a sensible gap in the ranks of Westmorlnad worthies.

The deceased gentleman, who was born in 1790, and who succeeded to the family property at the age of ten, on the death of his father, was educated at Sedbergh Grammar School, Dr. Gretton's, Windsor (where he had some distinguished associates), and at Cambridge, where he entered at St. John's College. Following the fashion of English gentlemen of his time he, soon after leaving college, made the grand tour on the Continent, travelling in his own carriage, as the custom then was, through France, Italy, and other countries. In 1814-15 he enjoyed the rare chance of crossing from Leghorn to Elba in a gunboat and having an interview there with Napoleon Buonaparte on the very day before he made his escape to France. Mr. Crackanthorpe, on settling down on his estate, threw himself with great ardour into politics. His first speech was delivered at Shap in favor of the enfranchisement of the people, then so unpopular a proposal that a motion which he made on the subject did not even receive a single supporter. In 1818 he seconded Mr. Henry Brougham's nomination as Parliamentary candidate for Westmorland; and he was one of Mr. Brougham's most active supporters on the three occasions on which he unsuccessfully contested the county. Afterwards he himself was brought forward as a candidate for the county of Westmorland in conjunction with Mr. Nowell, another Liberal, to fight against Colonel Lowther and Mr. W. W. Carus-Wilson; but before the day of nomination a compromise was effected by which a contest was avoided. Mr. Carus-Wilson and Mr. Crackanthorpe both agreed to retire, and so leave Colonel Lowther and Mr. Nowell, a Tory and a Liberal, to be returned unopposed. He supported Mr. Barham, the Liberal candidate for Westmorland, in 1832, on whose behalf he made a speech on the hustings. In Cumberland also he played a prominent part. The last important appearances of the deceased gentleman on the political platform occurred at Penrith in 1874 and 1876, when he presided at meetings held in connection with the contests in East Cumberland. In the former year the general election was held, and for the two seats in the division there were three candidates Mr. W. N. Hodgson and Sir Richard Musgrave, Conservatives, and the Hon. Charles Howard, Liberal. On Tuesday, the 3rd Feb., the week previous to the polling, a crowded meeting was held in the George Assembly Room, and addresses were given by Mr. George Howard, son of the candidate, Captain James (Barrock Park), Mr. H. C. Howard, and Admiral Elliott. Mr. Crackanthorpe, who was chairman of the central registration committee, took the chair, and made a speech marked by all those qualities of sonorous eloquence and intense earnestness which characterized his public addresses. Again, in 1876, Mr. Crackanthorpe addressed a meeting held in the Market Hall, Penrith, in favour of the candidature of Mr. E. S. Howard against Sir. R. C. Musgrave. Since then, although expressing his sympathy by letter and otherwise with Sir Henry Tufton, Mr. Alderman Whitehead, and other Liberal candidates, Mr. Crackanthorpe had not been able to appear on a public platform. For thirty-five years Mr. Crackanthorpe held the post of chairman of the East Ward Board of Guardians, and during the whole of that time performed public services of great value. He gave a constant and encouraging superintendence to the condition of the workhouse and school at Kirkby Stephen, and until the establishment of the Eden Valley Railway, regularly rode over the twenty miles or so between that place and Newbiggin Hall, in all weathers, on horseback. On his retirement from the chairmanship in 1871, a meeting was held at Kirkby Stephen, at which the guardians showed their high sense of the value of his public services by presenting him with a beautifully illuminated and elaborately bound address, which is still carefullly preserved at Newbiggin Hall, and which was presented by his successor, Mr Wm. Hopes. The career of the deceased gentleman as a magistrate was a long and useful one, dating from the accession of the new ministry in 1830, in which Lord Brougham was made Lord Chancellor. During the long presidency of the late Mr. Hasell, of Dalemain, over the Quarter Sessions of Cumberland and Westmorland, Mr. Crackanthorpe frequently acted as his deputy at Appleby. He also acted as chairman of the Petty Sessions at Appleby, and regularly attended the Cumberland Quarter Sessions. He was the oldest magistrate on the Commission of the Peace for Cumberland or Westmorland. He was a deputy Lieutenant of Westmorland, and filled the office of High Sheriff of Cumberland in 1821 before his name was on the Commission of the Peace. In addition to his ordinary duties as a justice of the peace, he was for many years visitor of the Lunatic Asylum at Dunstan Lodge, near Newcastle, before the County Asylum at Garlands was built.

The deceased was a warm supporter of every movement which had the physicial, social, and mental improvement of the working classes in view, and not only helped by his voice but by his purse. A characteristic act of generosity was his payment of the school fees of most of the poor children in Newbiggin before the Education Act was passed. When the Kirkbythore School Board was formed and Newbiggin included in its district, Mr. Crackanthorpe sunk £200 in the funds, for the permanent relief of the education rate of the latter place. He also rebuilt the parish church and did much for the living. The deceased was regular in his attendance at the Newbiggin parish church until about ten years ago when he fell and sustained a severe injury, which prevented his again taking exercise out of doors. His great age might be quoted in proof of the efficacy of temperance towards longevity. He was "temperate in all things." Mr. Crackanthorpe was never married, and the estates go to Mr. Montagu Cookson, Q.C., a leader of the Chancery Bar.

Amongst the many anecdotes of which the veteran squire was the subject, there is one, told in the story of the rise and progress of the Midland Railway, which deserves quotation. When the extension of the line wes projected, it was found that it would be necessary to cut down some fine oaks on his estate. He naturally heard of the contemplated act of vandalism towards his favourite trees with dismay, but was soon won over to the scheme. He asked, however, that one stately tree might be spared him. The request was readily granted "And do you know," he asked, "why I want it?" "We don't, sir," was the reply, "but no matter, your desire shall be respected." "Well then," rejoined Mr. Crackanthorpe, "I want it to hang you and all the Midland Railway directors upon."

Asthma cured by the double treatment of Southern Asthma Cure, is a common remark.

Meaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. James Brodie was down in Toronto last week attending the meeting of the Grand Orange Lodge.

Mr D. Johnston has secured the contract for delivering at the Flesherton cheese factory the milk on this route for the coming summer.

Mr. R. T. Brodie has returned to Brampton.

Several of the natives here took in the Orange Soiree and Concert at Eugenia last Friday and pronounced it a decided success.

Owing to the severe snow storm the Orange Soiree at Kells's corners was postponed until this Thursday evening.

Your correspondent is sorry for the item about an increase in Mr. A. Johnstons family as he has since learned that he was wrong and apologises for his mistake.

If you require a spring medicine, if you are suffering with languor, debility, pimples, boils, catarrh, chronic sores, scrofula, or loss of appetite, or any disease arising from impure blood, take Ayer's Sarsaparilla—the safest and most economical of all blood purifiers.

A Good Paper.

The Canadian Horticulturist for March is a most interesting and attractive number. The frontispiece is a beautiful colored plate of the Double Flowering Plum, one of the most elegant of flowering shrubs; and it has besides about fifteen fine illustrations. The contents are as follows:—

"Laying out a Lawn;" "Plan of a Greenhouse costing less than $10,00;" "Rambles among fruit growers;" My experience in fruit culture;" "Fruit notes;" "A large vine;" "A prominent American Horticulturist;" "Willow and Osier growing;" "How to grow the Lily of the Valley;" "Hints for the month;" "Pruning the apple;" "Pruning the grape;" "Questions on Fruit Culture answered;" "The English Sparrow;" "Our Fruit Markets," etc., etc.

This monthly Journal, which is the leading Canadian authority on fruit culture, may be had by addressing the Secretary of the Fruit Growers' Association of Ontario, Grimsby.

Subscription price $1.00 also entitling the subscriber to a selection from the Annual Distribution of Trees and Plants and to a Copy of the Annual Report for 1888.

Have you a cough? Sleepless nights need no longer trouble you. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral will stop the cough, allay the inflamation, and induce repose. It will, moreover, heal the pulmonary organs and give you health.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several, at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

THE KAISER IS DEAD.

SKETCH OF THE DEAD EMPEROR'S LIFE.

The Succession.

The heir apparent to the German throne is the now dying Crown Prince, Frederick William. He is 57 years old, and some of the events of his life have more than ordinary interest. In 1858 he was married to the Princess Victoria, daughter of the Queen of England. She made him a model husband and father, which is not always the case with his family. In 1883 they celebrated their silver wedding. He has taken part in the Danish, Austrian and French wars, and in the last one he showed great bravery and military skill. He was a great traveller before his illness and in good favor with the people and the army. His son, the young Prince William, who is empowered by the dead Emperor's proclamation to sign royal decrees and transact some affairs of State, is 28 years old, was trained in the military schools at Wiesbaden, after his father had apprenticed him to a glover, for, like all the Crown Prince's children, he had to learn a trade. While at school he showed himself to be a pretty sensible fellow, not above association with his poorer fellows, with whom he used to swap lunches for the sake of getting German peasant's black bread. His left hand is deformed, and has to be kept gloved constantly, much to the Prince's mortification. He is an accomplished army officer.

THE LATE EMPEROR.

The late Emperor, had he survived till the 22nd inst., would have attained his 91st year, having been born on March 22nd, 1797, at a moment when the French revolution had begun to triumph over its many enemies, including the King of Prussia. The Emperor's grandfather, Frederick William II., nephew of Frederick the Great, was still upon the throne, but died soon after, leaving his kingdom to the Emperor's father, Frederick William III. The first nine years of William's life were among his happiest. His mother, the beautiful and accomplished Queen Louise, daughter of the Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, took personal charge of the lad's education.

DAYS OF SORROW.

The year 1806, with its cruel changes, destroyed this lovely idyl. Through his vacillating course in dealing with the Emperor Napoleon, King Frederick William found himself suddenly isolated from the rest of Europe and a prey to the conqueror. The battles of Jena, Auerstadt and Saalfeld decided the fate of his kingdom, from which Napoleon sliced off 2,700 square miles with a population of 5,000,000 souls. On no one did this blow fall more heavily than on the Queen. Her flight after the Prussian defeats was attended with much misery and suffering, and her poignant sorrow failed not to awaken a responsive echo in her children's hearts. Nor were her exhortations unheeded.

"Children," cried the great-hearted, patriotic woman, "upon you will fall the duty some day of retrieving this terrible disaster to our beloved country. Be men, and let not the degeneracy of the present day make you its victims. Be the worthy successors of the great Frederick, and if it is beyond your power to re-establish the country's independence die in defence of her honor as did Prince Louis Earnest at the battle of Saalfeld."

William first "smelled powder" in the campaigns of 1813 and 1815 against France. In 1840 he was appointed Governor of Pomerania, and held that post until the revolution of 1848 broke out, when he sought refuge in England. In May, 1848, he was elected a member of the Constituent Assembly, returned to Berlin and took his seat in that body June 8th, 1848. He was made Commander-in-Chief of the Prussian Army acting against the revolutionary forces of Baden in June, 1849, and when his brother's mind gave way in 1858 Prince William, as he was then termed, was created Regent, immediately dismissed the aristocratic party and adopted liberal policy.

KING OF PRUSSIA.

Frederick William IV., his brother, dying without issue Jan. 2nd 1861, he succeeded to the throne under the title of William I., placing the crown on his own head at Konigsberg, Oct. 18th, at the same time emphatically asserting the doctrine of the "right divine of kings." Immediately upon his accession to the throne he began a contest with the Chamber of Deputies, which became more and more critical until after Count Bismarck-Schoenhausen had been appointed Prime Minister in 1862, a civil war threatening to convulse the country. But the aggressive war on Denmark, in which Prussia and Austria were jointly engaged, served to divert the attention of the people from internal troubles, and since the close of that war the firm attitude of the sovereign has endeared him to his loyal subjects and made him dreaded by his enemies.

But his youthful training for the career of arms prompted him to prepare to draw the sword and assert Prussia's supremacy. Military preparations were made on a large scale, and early in 1866 his trusted lieutenants pronounced the scheme ripe for execution. An alliance was concluded with Italy, an ultimatum sent to the smaller States in Northern Germany, war was declared against Austria June 17th, 1866, and headed by King and Royal Princes a large army was set in motion and the bloody battle of Sadowa compelled Austria to bend to the dust and conclude a humiliating peace. In this campaign the merits of the "needle gun" or breech loader were first fairly tested and the results achieved caused consternation throughout the military world, and set the powers busy at work upon the reorganization of armies. The King of Prussia became the head of the North German Confederation in 1867, comprising twenty-two States and representing a population of about 30,000,000 souls. The part played by King William in the war known as the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71 is a matter of history, and it is not necessary to touch upon it at present, but the result attained was the warrior-king's dream—a United Germany.

EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

On January 18th 1871, King William of Prussia was proclaimed Emperor of Germany within the palace of the French Kings of Versailles, in the historical Hall of Mirrors, and surrounded by the stern soldiers composing the army he had led in triumph to the capital of France. That moment was probably the most gratifying point of Emperor William's career, but the grim warrior bore the honors showered upon him with kingly dignity and true soldierly bearing. The meeting of the Emperors of Germany, Russia and Austria took place at Berlin in the autumn of 1872. In October of that year the Emperor William gave a decision adverse to England on the San Juan boundary question, submitted to his arbitration by the British and American Governments. He visited the Czar at St. Petersburg in April, 1873, and in October of the same year visited the Emperor of Austria at Vienna. The correspondence between the Emperor William and the Pope relative to the prosecution of the Church in Prussia was published at Berlin, Oct. 14th, 1873. Since then and within the last year or two, the Emperor has made his peace with His Holiness.

ATTEMPTS ON HIS LIFE.

Two attempts have been made to assassinate the Emperor, one May 11th, 1878, while he was driving in Berlin. A young Socialist named Emil Hoedel fired two shots at him from a revolver, but neither of them hit the mark, the Emperor standing up in his carriage and calmly asking if the shots were fired at him. Hoedel was eventually executed. The second attempt was on June 2nd, 1878. His Majesty was driving in Unter den Linden, when two shots were fired from the window of a house, wounding him in several places. The would-be assassin was a Dr. Nobling, who, after attempting to commit suicide, was secured by the crowd, removed to the hospital and subsequently died there from the effects of the wound he had inflicted upon himself. William I. married June 11th, 1829, the Princess Augusta, daughter of Charles Frederick, Grand Duke of Weimar. They have two children—Prince Frederick William, born Oct. 18th, 1831, and the Princess Louise Mary, Grand Duchess of Baden, born Dec. 3rd, 1838.

Emperor William did not smoke or take snuff. Neither did he wear spectacles. When reading or writing he used an eyeglass, although he never wished to admit that his sight was growing weak. His Majesty, up to a short time since, slept as soundly as the heathiest of youths, and never took a rest during the course of the day. He is survived by the Empress, who as a Princess of Weimar, remembers the glorious epoch when the genius of Goethe illuminated that little capital. She passed much of her time in the presence of the great poet, and from this early education and association the Empress Augusta has preserved a refined literary taste.

BRITAIN'S DEFENCES.

Churchill's Demand for a Royal Commission to Expose the Rottenness of the Army and Navy Management Refused.

A London cable says: The debate on the motion of Sir Walter Barttelot (Conservative) for the appointment of a Royal Commission to ascertain and report upon military measures necessary for the protection of the Empire was resumed in the House of Commons last night by Lord Randolph Churchill. He commenced his speech by reminding the House that no fewer than 178 members were connected with the army and navy services, and that the debate had disclosed their absolute unanimity on one point, namely, that notwithstanding the immense increase in expenditure, the military position of England was deplorably bad. The remedy of those members was the expenditure of more money, but his remedy was reform in the expenditure. Enough had already been paid to maintain both services in a state of splendid efficiency. But the English system was without a parallel in any other country—military men who had been trained in the business of arms being subordinate to civilians who were utterly untrained. It would be just as reasonable for the Premier to nominate Mr. Labouchere as Archbishop of Canterbury, or to make Mr. Chaplin Lord Chancellor. (Laughter.) Military training seemed to disqualify a man from managing the War Offices. That must be altered. The financial control, after the estimates are granted, ought to be placed in the hands of responsible officers. English officers were made spending animals instead of, like the German officers, rivalling one another in economy. Stores for a German regiment could go to the front on twelve hours' notice without prolonged letters from the War Office. That could not be done in England without piles of files passing and repassing for several days. The German corps d'armee was maintained upon £1,000,000 as against £7,000,000 for the English corps. This monstrous waste extended to every branch of the services. A right and vigorous inquiry and radical reforms were imperatively necessary. He could not vote confidence in the existing system. It was hopelessly bad. (Cheers.)

Mr. Stanhope, Secretary for War, intimated that the Government would sanction an inquiry into any definite matter connected with the estimates, but would resist the appointment of a Royal Commission of a vague general character. The motion for the appointment of a Royal Commission was negatived.

A Defect in the Treaty.

A Canadian has brought suit against a St. Paul lady for breach of promise of marriage. There is nothing in the new fisheries treaty which deals with matters of this sort, and Mr. Chamberlain has already sailed for England, so it may be necessary to appoint a new commission to establish fixed rules governing the two nations while fishing in each other's matrimonial waters. —Chicago News.

DEATH TRAP ON FIRE.

Massachusetts Printing Office Destroyed by Fire—Six Employees Lose Their Lives and Many are Injured—Exciting Scenes.

A Springfield, Mass., despatch says: The new office of the Evening Union was burned at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon. Six of the employees met a terrible death. Most of them jumped from the fifth story and were crushed into a shapeless mass below. Six others were badly injured. The fire was first discovered in the mailing-room, and clouds of smoke were pouring out of the lower story windows before the fifty souls on the upper floor were aware of the danger. The flames shot up an old elevator in rear, cutting off escape by the stairway, and most of the employees who escaped found their way to the ground by way of the roof in the rear. The unfortunate men and women who crowded into the editorial rooms met a horrible fate. Some were cut off in the composing room, and there is still a terrible suspense, as several fell back into the flames. The employees who rushed into the editorial room were cut off from the escape in the rear and had to face the horrible alternative of burning to death or jumping to the sidewalk below, with the probability of receiving frightful injuries The fire department responded promptly, but it seemed an age before the firemen reached the windows in the fifth story. A ladder was placed to reach to the fourth story, and the sight of rescue so near seemed to madden the suffering persons at the two windows above and one by one they dropped to the sidewalks below. Six persons fell in this way. Some of them were forced off and some leaped madly, while the crowd below groaned and turned their heads away as they whirled through the air. The dead are as follows: Henry J. Goulding, foreman of the Union composing-room, burned to death; Miss G. Thompson, proofreader, and Mrs. Frederick E. Farley, who was employed in the editorial department, fell from the window; Mr. Lamzon, of Quebec, jumped from the window; W. E. Hovey, of Boston, fell to the sidewalk; Mr. Brown, a compositor. The list of injured is as follows: Thomas Donohue, compositor, left leg broken at the knee and bad cut on the head; Timothy Dunn, compositor, arm and leg broken; Joseph W. Witty, compositor, badly burned; he clung to the window until the fire forced him to drop, but he fell on a ladder and was saved. G. F. Ensworth, compositor, compound fracture of the leg.

It is thought that the fire started among the lumber in the closet on the ground floor. The flames were drawn up the elevator and spread through the composing room. There were more than thirty compositors, men and women, on the fifth floor. There was no fire escape.

HER SKIN TURNED BLACK.

A Young Lady's Strange Affliction and a Weird Story of a Curse.

A Toledo, Ohio, despatch says: Grace Arlie, a beautiful young lady living with her parents in the Fifth Ward, was taken suddenly ill six months ago, and for several weeks she suffered from an apparent attack of typhoid fever. At the end of the third week bright red spots came out over her face and limbs and gradually extended over her entire body. A week later the spots began to grow dark in color. In two months from the time she was first taken Miss Arlie seemed to have recovered from the fever and began to gain in strength, but the condition of her skin grew worse and worse, until her body finally became as black as that of a negro. Meanwhile she regained strength, and is to-day in full mental vigor. A relative of the family tells the remarkable story that five years ago Miss Arlie's father was a prosperous planter in South Carolina, and kept a large number of negroes to work for him. One of them became abusive one day and threatened Arlie, who, blind with passion, drew his revolver and shot the negro dead. The wife of the negro saw her husband fall, and, going up to Arlie, invoked curses upon him. Arlie never recovered from the effects of the tragedy, but in a year or so moved North, locating in this city. He is a man of wealth and largely interested in manufactures. He is preparing to take his daughter to Europe for treatment.

SHE LEFT COLLEGE.

An Incident that Caused Sam Jones' Daughter to Make a Hasty Exit.

A Louisville, Ky., despatch says: Miss Annie Jones, daughter of Sam Jones, the evangelist, has left the female college at Millersburg, Ky., under singular circumstances. Rev. Joe Jones, brother of Sam Jones, is conducting a revival at Millersburg. A few nights ago, at the close of the preaching, he called on J. B. Sheckley, a student in the Wesleyan Theological School at Millersburg, to pray. The young man was sitting a short distance from Miss Jones. He knelt down, and after an invocation of the divine blessing, besought that while Samuel Jones was going about saving sinners, the Master's grace might bring salvation to his daughter, who was going to perdition as fast as she could. Miss Jones arose and went hurriedly out of the church, and later, saying she would not stay in a community where women were not safe from insults, left for her home at Atlanta, Ga.

THE DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Sir Charles Tupper presented a message from His Excellency, transmitting copies of the Fishery Treaty between Great Britain and the United States, together with the protocols, offering to make temporary arrangements for a modus vivendi, pending a ratification of the treaty. Sir Charles Tupper said he was glad to be able to announce that he had obtained the consent of Mr. Bayard to lay upon the table the proposals made by the British plenipotentiaries and the reply thereto in regard to the greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the two countries.

Sir Richard Cartwright inquired if these comprised all the papers in relation to this question.

Sir Charles Tupper said they comprised everything affecting the trade relations between the two countries that it was in his power to lay before the House.

Mr. Mitchell said he presumed that, in addition to the proposals, considerable discussion took place on the subject. He thought the House would like to know whether the Minister proposed to the Conference merely an interchange of natural products of the two countries, or whether it embraced manufactured articles also.

Sir Charles Tupper said there was a proposal made for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the two countries. This was met with the categorical refusal on the part of the United States plenipotentiaries to entertain the question at all, because Congress had reserved to itself the uncontrolled power to deal from day to day with the tariff, free from any treaty interference. It was true, however, as Mr. Angell was reported to have said in an interview, that the British plenipotentiaries had pressed the question, but without avail.

Mr. Mitchell said he entertained too high an opinion of the ability of the Minister of Finance to believe that after he had received at the outset such an unmistakable answer from the American negotiators to his proposal to consider trade questions, he would continue to press the question for a month or more before the conference, without stating in detail the concessions that Canada would be willing to make. He thought that if any specific offers were made by the Minister of Finance the House should know of them.

The House went into Committee of Supply on the item of $25,462 for the office of Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

Mr. Mills asked who is at present the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Sir John Macdonald replied Mr. St. Onge Chapleau, formerly of the Public Works Department.

Mr. Mills said he understood that Mr. Chapleau had been dismissed from the Public Works Department for divulging for a consideration secrets in connection with contracts. He did not think that under these circumstances the Government should have appointed Mr. Chapleau to the important office of Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Sir John Macdonald was not aware that Mr. Chapleau was dismissed.

Mr. Mills said the Government had asked Mr. Chapleau to resign.

Sir John Macdonald said Mr. Chapleau had resigned and been appointed sheriff in the Northwest. On the re-organization of Dominion affairs in the Northwest that office had been abolished, and he was appointed Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Sir Richard Cartwright said it was degrading to the civil service to have a man who has committed a grave offence promoted over the heads of others who have conscientiously discharged their duty.

Sir John Macdonald said it would be unjust to Mr. Chapleau to continue the discussion without having a proper knowledge of the facts. He suggested that the item stand.

The item stood.

On the item respecting the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Mills objected to the promotion of Mr. Pope from the position of Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to that of a chief clerk in the patent branch of the Department of Agriculture. This officer had been found guilty of a dereliction of duty amounting to malfeasance in office, in withholding the election returns of nearly all the Opposition members from being gazetted and giving precedence to supporters of the Government. When the matter was brought to the notice of the Government, Mr. Pope, in his defence, made a false statement to the House, thus aggravating his offence. In the face of that wrong done to nearly one-half the members of the House, the Government, instead of dismissing that officer, had undertaken to promote him, giving him the rank of a deputy minister and a far greater degree of responsibility than he had proved himself worthy of.

Sir John Macdonald said Mr. Pope had simply the powers of a chief clerk, as his predecessor had.

The item passed and the committee rose and reported.

Sir Charles Tupper, in answer to the inquiry of Sir Richard Cartwright, said it was not his intention to deliver the budget speech till after the debate on trade relations is disposed of.

Mr. Boyle, in moving to add to the Monopoly Inquiry Committee power to investigate insurance combinations, thought it was proper the investigation should be extended in that direction. It was known to most of the members of the House that a powerful and tyrannical combination existed in the insurance business. If the inquiry was to be pursued it should embrace that class of monopolies. When the committee met the other day and took stock of its powers, it was discovered these combinations had not been included and he now asked the House to add the power desired.

The motion was carried.

The House went into Committee of Supply.

On the item of $195,250 for departmental contingencies,

Mr. McMullen asked for details. Usually a very large sum was spent for cab hire of Ministers. He thought it would be better to pay them larger salaries and let them provide their own carriages.

Sir John Macdonald said that with their present allowance the Ministers could not provide themselves with carriages unless they drew heavily upon their private means. He could produce particulars of every item. He concurred in the suggestion that the Ministers should be paid larger salary, and no doubt the hon. gentleman from East York would concur in his statement that the salary of Ministers was inadequate.

Mr. Mackenzie—I am quite willing you should get all I got.

The item passed.

On the item of $2,000 for expenses of the High Commissioner's office in England,

Sir Richard Cartwright asked if the Finance Minister is again to be High Commissioner, or will he retain his position in the Cabinet. He cannot attend to the duties of both offices at one time. The present position in the House was enough for any ordinary mortal. A decision on this point must be pressed for. The Finance Minister is very useful here, and he (Sir Richard Cartwright) was bound to say that that gentleman is by far the best Minister of Finance he had ever seen in his time on that side of the House. He thought the Finance Minister was bound to say which office he intended to hold.

Sir Charles Tupper thanked the hon. gentleman for the compliment. No injury had been done to the country by the saving of $10,000, owing to his performing the duty of Finance Minister and looking after the office of High Commissioner in London during the past year. He ventured to say that greater service had never been done for Canada by the High Commissioner's office than since last session. The hon. gentleman was not half so anxious as he (Sir Charles Tupper) was that he should be relieved of the double duty he had to discharge. He felt his inadequacy to continue for any long period the onerous duties that had been thrown upon him. He hoped his hon. friend the First Minister would, as soon as possible, make arrangements to relieve him of the double duties he has to perform.

Mr. Mills said the Minister of Finance was not obeying the spirit of the law in holding two positions. His absence from the country had prevented him from bringing down the budget speech in proper time.

Mr. Armstrong thought the office of High Commissioner could very well be abolished.

The item passed.

Mr. Mitchell called the attention of the House to the report that the Governor-General had invited Messrs. Greenway and Martin to an interview with reference to the Manitoba difficulty. As he (Mr. Mitchell) understood, the business of this country is carried on by constitutional Ministers who are responsible to the House. If it was true that these gentlemen had been invited to interview the Governor, he would like to know at whose instance it took place. He would regret to hear that His Excellency, after such a good record as he enjoyed, would be guilty of such an unwarrantable interference. He would like to know whether the Governor had acted on behalf of the Government or had assumed a responsibility he had no right to assume.

Sir Hector Langevin said the Government, as responsible advisers of the Crown, are ready at all times to take the responsibility for any action the Governor might take in matters of State. The Governor-General had not to his knowledge or to the knowledge of the House ever been guilty of any interference which was not quite proper.

Mr. Mitchell said there was another matter to which he desired to call the attention of the Government. He read in the Montreal Gazette that Newfoundland had been asked to enter Confederation, and that the colony had been requested to send a deputation to Ottawa to negotiate. As this appeared in the Government organ, he presumed it to be correct. While Parliament is in session it should be taken into the confidence of the Government before a communication of that kind is sent to a colony. The Government should not have assumed the responsibility without consulting the House.

Sir John Macdonald—It is true that these communications have taken place.

Sir Richard Cartwright said the House had been treated with scant courtesy that a matter of such importance should be first made public through the medium of one of those precious paid organs of the hon. gentlemen. It is not strange, but goes to show that we have got a one-man power here, who does what he pleases. For all practical purposes the people of Canada would be better off by sending a hundred and twenty or a hundred and thirty proxies to the hon. gentleman.

FEARFUL CATASTROPHE.

Disastrous Earthquake in China—Devastation of Property—Thousands of Lives Lost.

A San Francisco despatch says: The Hong Kong Mail gives a description of the earthquake in the Province of Yunnan on December 15th, and is indicative of frightful mortality. The Mail says: In the interior department of Ching Chan the disturbances were extremely violent, being continued at irregular intervals for four days, when they ceased entirely. The Departmental city is said to have been reduced to a mass of ruins, scarcely a house escaping damage, and over 5,000 persons are reported to have been killed by falling buildings. Many of them were buried under the ruins, while the number of injured is too large for computation. Yamen was destroyed. At the Prefectuenel city of Lamon the effects of the earthquake were scarcely less disastrous. At this place, when the shock was being felt, an enormous chasm opened in the earth and water was thrown out from its depths. At Lo Chau in Chuen a striking change has been caused in the appearance of the country. Large tracts of land were swallowed up and the surface changed into a lake. In Lo Chau more than 10,000 persons are said to have perished.

THE BOYCOTT DEFENDED.

An Irish Clergyman Finds Scriptural Warrant for It.

ST. PAUL ITS FIRST ADVOCATE.

(Rev. Canon Doyle, of Arthurstown, Ireland.)

But is this a new punishment invented for evil doers in our day? What does St. Paul say, I. Corinthians v. 11: "But now I have written to you, not to keep company, if any man that is named a brother, be a fornicator, or covetous, or a server of idols, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such a one not so much as to eat.' 13th verse—"Put away the evil one from among yourselves." What "covetous" man is so guilty as he who covets and grabs his neighbors' lands to the utter ruin and destruction of himself and family? Good God what a curse and calamity the grabber and the evictor have been to their native land! I was on the New Ross mission from September, 1846, to February, 1853. Three counties, Wexford, Kilkenny and Carlow, converge at that town. Its union is one of the largest, I believe, in Ireland, comprising large portions of the three above-named counties. The food of the people failed without any fault of theirs. Then the grabber and the evictor commenced their woeful work. The poor people were swept from their homes with as little compunction as you would tear a burrow of rats. Having no place to rest, they swarmed into the town. Besides the main house, the guardians had to provide acres of shops, auxiliary workhouses, and wards. All the alleys, lanes and slums of the town were literally packed with the poor. The dreadful scourge of typhus fever in its most virulent form seized upon its victims. It is quite impossible for one who did not witness and pass through these scenes to realize to himself the unutterable misery of those years. But wretched as was the material condition of the grabbers and landlords' victims, their moral ruin was even more heartrending. Imagine crowds of simple young country girls packed into the low lodging-houses of a large seaport town, where everything they saw and heard might be the proximate occasion of sin for a saint. Have I not known hundreds of peasant girls who, when they were evicted from their humble homes, were as pure as the springs that gushed from the heart of their native hills, to have, amidst these overwhelming temptations, fallen away, become a shame to their sex and a disgrace to their country! The grabber and the evictor will answer for their souls. Am I to be told I am not to warn my people to avoid a wretch who is the prime cause of all those material and moral calamities? The teaching of St. Paul quoted above is far more precise and comprehensive than any denunciation issued by the National League. But is there not danger of murder? St. Paul did not think so. But our people are "excitable." Not a whit more so than the Jews, as must be obvious to any one acquainted with the characteristics of both nations. St. Peter and St. Paul are evidently two Irishmen who were accidentally born in Judea. Boycotting "a terrible risk of the crime of murder?" Quite the contrary; for if the bishops, priests and people would with one voice denounce the grabber, the monster would immediately disappear like the wolf; so you would have nothing of the kind to hunt or to kill. But boycotting and the Plan may be abused. Quite so. Is there a gift of God or an invention of man that is not frequently and fearfully abused? Have not the attributies of the soul and the faculties of the body become so debased and degraded that it would seem as if all flesh had corrupted its way, and that the immutable God would again be sorry he had created man? As to the inventions of man, take for example the press. Is it not availed to pour a very deluge of abominations upon the world? Even the beautiful and interesting art of the photographer is employed as an auxiliary of the press to ruin those who cannot read, and plunge them into a seething abyss of pictorial putrescence. Yes, the best and most holy things can be abused. If, however, the priests stand by the people as they ought, to guide and direct them, there is little or no danger in "the boycot" or "The Plan." If the priest retires and abandons the people, of course they will stray like sheep without experience. I speak from the practical experience of years.

How to Have Pretty Faces.

Have a big bowl full of hot water—when I say hot I mean hot, I don't mean tepid—put in both hands and lave the face thoroughly with this hot water until it is as red as the proverbial lobster. The hands are the proper things to wash the face with, because they are cloths with intelligence added to them. Do not dry the face, but just as quickly as possible give it another laving with very cold water. The warm water cleanses the skin, the cold water gives vigor to it, makes the flesh firm and prevents one from catching cold. I hope that you will spread this news, and that there will be more clean-faced women in New York than ever before, and they certainly will have good skins, and frighten off the wrinkles if they follow the advice of Barbara in New York Star.

"Large family! Devoted?" gasped the old gentleman in amazement. "What on earth do you mean, ma'am?" "Why, yes, indeed," said the Principal, beaming through her glasses. "No less than eleven of Gussie's brothers have been here this winter to take her out sleigh-riding, and she tells me she expects the tall one with the blue eyes again to-morrow."—Puck.

AN ARTIFICIAL NECK.

His Own Broken in a Railroad Smash, and Won't Mend.

A man with his head in a cage and neck bent to the right attracted considerable attention Saturday at the Murray Hill Hotel. As he walked he limped painfully. In his shirt bosom he wore a large cluster diamond pin. He was Barney Baldwin, who thinks he has been more broken up than any living man. His injuries include a broken neck, two broken legs, a broken arm, five broken ribs and a broken collar bone. He tells this story:

"I was born and brought up in New York," he said yesterday. "I am 36 years old, but my mother and sister, who live thirteen blocks away from here, don't know what a fix I'm in. They think I'm in Australia. I was yardmaster on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and it was March 19th last, in the yard at Birmingham, Alabama, that the throttle of an engine got out of order and the engine ran wild. I was on a caboose with six cars attached. When the engine struck the section I was shaken off. In the fall I dislocated my shoulder, broke my right arm at the elbow and my leg at the ankle. I threw my right leg over the foot board of the engine and broke that leg in two places. The ashpan of the engine passing over me broke five ribs and cracked six vertebræ of my neck. I was unconscious for 36 hours and was totally blind for 14 days. I lay on a water mattrass 129 days, and I was five months and seventeen days in bed. Since that time I have never laid down, because the vertebræ of my neck are not knit together yet, and if I should try the vertebræ would slip, press on the spinal cord, and produce unconsciousness. For four months after the injury I felt stupid, and every now and then passed off into a trance that lasted two and a-half hours. I have got so now that I can sleep three hours a night in a sitting posture, but I can't lie down. My broken legs and ribs and arms have mended. It is the neck and spine that give me the only trouble."

The physicians who pulled him through were Drs. James B. Luckie and Copeland C. Barclay, of Birmingham. After giving a long list of eminent physicians who had examined him and pronounced him a curiosity too dangerous to handle, he said that he asked them all if he would ever be able to remove the mask and get a night's sleep. They could give him no enlightenment. Then Baldwin showed his wounds—first the scars on his legs, then the right arm with the silver joint, and finally the stout waist of leather and silk which holds in place the steel rod that runs from his hips along the spinal column, forming a curve above the head to the upper end of which is attached a crossbar from which depend leather straps to hold his head up. It's an artificial backbone. One strap goes under the chin and forms a cup in which the chin rests. His purpose in coming to the city is to see if Dr. Sayre can straighten his broken neck for him. It now inclines considerably to the right. Baldwin said that a number of physicians were already anxious to buy his body. Dr. Clayborne, of Aukland, and Dr. Saufield, of San Francisco, he said, had both offered him $10,000, but he had no fear of dying yet.—New York Sun.

Romance of Wedded Life.

"James, dear, will you bring me up a hod of coal from the cellar?" said a busy wife.

"That's just the way with you," said James, with a black frown, as he put down his book and rose up from the lounge.

"Just the way with me?"

"Yes," he snapped. "As soon as you see me enjoying myself you have some chore or other for me to do. Didn't you see I was absorbed in my reading?"

"Well, dear, I will do it myself."

"Yes, and tell everybody, your mother especially, that you have to carry your own coal up from the cellar. No, I'll do it. Let me mark my place."

So he marked the place in the book at which he had ceased reading, and when he went down to the cellar, grumbling all the way, she picked up the volume and found it was a love story and that the passage he had been absorbed in was as follows: "My darling, when you are my wife I will shield and protect you from every care, the winds of heaven shall not visit your face too roughly, those pretty hands shall never be soiled by menial tasks, your wish shall be my law, your happiness"——

Just then he reappeared, and, dumping the hod on the floor, said: "There's your darned coal. Give me my book."

Curious Cures and Customs.

Rev. F. A. Reiss, of the Rectory, Rock, Bewdley, writes to us: The following "cure" for whooping-cough was used, to my knowledge, in this parish: A live frog is held to the open mouth of the child; the frog dies and the child recovers. Another custom was prevalent at one time in the parish. On Ascension Day raindrops were carefully collected, bottled and used as a cure for sore eyes. I once was talking to a farmer on Ascension Day when a few drops of rain fell. He said, "Now my old woman will get some holy water." At my request he explained the use, and I found afterwards that an old woman had two or three dozen of "old bottled" laid down in her cellar. The wife of a publican in this parish makes a small loaf of bread every Good Friday and keeps it hung in the kitchen till next Good Friday. It never goes mouldy or bad, and is a certain cure for English cholera.—St. James' Gazette.

Caught a Tartar.

The female Mayor of Argonia, Kan., has made the men of the town, who elected her for a joke, feel that they had caught a Tartar. She has put a stop to their poker games, billiard playing and other "funny business" after 9 p. m. There has not been a cowboy jamboree nor a real old-time jollification with shooting-iron accompaniments since she took her seat. Everybody in bed by half-past 9, and the sports are skipping the town. The joke that caused her election will not be repeated if the jokers survive her term of office.

GREEN IS FASHIONABLE.

The Novelties in Feminine Apparel for Spring and Summer Wear.

Green promises to be the fashionable as well as the appropriate color for early spring. Bright apple green is the caprice of the moment with Frenchwomen, and is shown here in velvets, nets, flowers and other rich goods for trimming, but is not effective in simple materials. Pale Nile green and the grayish green reseda or mignonette are stylish shades; also the yellowish tilleul or linden green, and clear, dark cedar, myrtle and ivy leaf tints; hunter's green is a bright hue, and the moss and olive shades are all repeated. Cream and wheat colors are shown in a variety of tints running into golden brown. "Paradise" is a radiant shade of yellow, so called from the yellow tint in the bird of paradise plumage. This is a new color, and will prove an excellent one to brighten dark shades and bring out their purity of tone—a foil for other colors. It is also dull enough to be as becoming worn next the skin as yellow lace, softening the flesh tints. The intense yellows are straw, maize and beaten gold. Antique gold is a dull golden color, without any of the greenish tint of old gold. One of the brilliant copper colors is called Nubian. Indian and Siam reds are used a great deal, and come rightfully under the head of copper. The bright poppy and scarlet are used as shadings for all colors. Brown shades are always to the front in the intermediate seasons, and now reappear as tobacco, suede, beige, castor and many drab tints, with more gray than the yellow browns. The new gray shade is a mouse color, and steel and silver grays are also continued in favor. Gobelin blues are imported again, but the tendency is toward clear blue shades without a mixture of other tints. Black promises to remain popular as a trimming for bright colors, such as green, scarlet and suede, where it is used in laces, beads, ribbons and feathers. Heliotrope has quite gone by, and, unfortunately, its unpopularity affects the lovely lavenders and violets and other kindred shades.

The principal novelty in straw bonnets and hats are the ombri or shaded braids; these may be used as entire bonnets for early spring, or as borders to bonnets with made crowns of silk, velvet or gauge. Colored straws are shown of various kinds, from the plain Milan to fancy braids of narrow rows like fine straw gimp, while others are in open lace-like designs, to be made up over colored net frames, and show the color well through them. Chips of admirable lightness are also revived in all the new colors, and the thin Neapolitan braids are made up in plain rows, and also in lace patterns of flowers and web-like designs. Fine Milans will undoubtedly be the most desirable straw this season, but milliners say that chip hats are gradually coming into favor, and that more will be used this season than ever.

Children's Punishment in England.

The punishments that fond parents have devised for their beloved offspring are many and curious. Most of them, as is quite proper, are corporal. Boys are strapped, caned and birched, and both they and their sisters are slapped on various parts of their bodies, shaken by the scruff of the neck or shoulders, made to stand on chairs by the hour, or, worse than all, are sent to bed in the middle of the day when the sun is shining and their companions are playing under the bed-room windows. Mr. Stevenson, in his "Child's Garland of Verses," pathetically asks:

> Now does it not seem hard to you
> When all the sky is clear and blue,
> And I should like so much to play
> To have to go to bed by day?

Many children have felt the same in similar cases. It is, we suppose, peculiar to poor people to punish their children by making them sit on cold doorsteps. Nothing can be more ludicrous than the sight of a little wretch wriggling about on a slab of stone in front of the cottage door, but ludicrous as it is to see, the punishment is brutal and dangerous, and doctors and district visitors should lose no opportunity of putting it down. While they are about it the former might say a word to both rich and poor about the hateful practice of boxing boys' ears and caning their hands. It has been well remarked that nature has provided children with a place especially fitted for bodily chastisement, and it was never intended that the delicate mechanism of the human ear and hand should be subjected to the violence of pedagogues who, in their ignorance or reckless brutality, shower their blows upon them. So much, then, for the infliction of bodily punishment, of which it only remains to be said that it is nearly always the best if temperately administered, being soon over, but not easily forgotten. Dr. Johnson's opinion on this point is well known.—London Globe.

Wrist Watches.

I was not surprised to see that nearly al the fair sex were wearing the wrist watches which are now so entirely the fashion in London, but which, I believe, are very little worn, as yet, in America. Made in every form from the plain leather strap to the magnificent bracelet, where the face of the watch is encircled by precious stones, they are both ornamental and convenient. Novelties are even being introduced in the shape of purses, pocketbooks, sticks and umbrellas containing diminutive time-keepers, and one jeweller, more daring than the rest, has manufactured some rings resembling signet-rings, but having instead of a crest a tiny watch. It is scarcely likely, however, that these will ever become fashionable, as they must be extremely bulky and ponderous for wearing on the finger.—Philadelphia Telegraph's London Letter.

Disappointed.

An English lord who visited America was at a dinner given in his honor. A little daughter of his host, who was too well-bred to stare, but who eyed him covertly as the occasion presented itself, finally ventured to remark: "And are you really and truly an English lord?" "Yes," he answered, pleasantly, "really and truly." "I have often thought I would like to see an English lord," she went on, "and—and—" "And now you are satisfied at last?" he put in laughingly. "N—o," replied the truthful little girl; "I'm not satisfied; I'm a good deal disappointed."

MARVELS OF TELEGRAPHY.

A Conversation Between London, Cairo and San Francisco.

One of the marvels of telegraphy was fully demonstrated last Sunday morning, when operators in the Western Union office in this city carried on an interesting conversation over hill and dale, over mountains capped with snow, through valleys of perennial green, under the Atlantic ocean with its unexplored secrets, over the vine clad regions of Europe and under the Mediterranean, with Cairo, in the land of the Pharoahs. The time was 3 o'clock in the morning, just after a heavy night's work, "good night" having been received on the last press despatch. The dramatis personæ were three operators, and the way the affair came about was as follows:

Chief—All clear. Have you a cigar, Bob?

Bob—You bet; but I'll keep it.

Chief—You will? Who are you working with, Tom?

Tom—Chicago. I've old Fox here. He's going to turn on the cable office, and by the mortal Frost I'll speak with Valentia or bust. "Co, Co, Co, Co," rattled off the sounds and "I, I, I, Co," came in response.

"There is the cable office," said the Chicago operator, "go for him, old fellow."

To Valentia—Let us have London, now, please—Tor Bay.

Valentia to London—Here is San Francisco, Cal., who wants to speak with you. Tor Bay is doing the cable transactions.

London to San Francisco—Delighted to meet you by wire. It is just striking noon by St. Paul's clock, and very foggy as usual. How is the weather there?

"This is wonderful," responded San Francisco. "It is 4.30 o'clock, standard time, here, and not yet daylight. We receive many cables from London, but never had the pleasure of meeting you before. Any Americans there? It is raining slightly. There are plenty of mushrooms on the hills, and the boys will be selling violets on the street corners to-day."

London, having secured a signal from Cairo, wrote: "San Francisco, Cal., is on here and sends greetings. They want to connect the wonderland of the new world with prehistoric Egypt."

Cairo—Say to San Francisco that it is a pleasure to span half the globe to speak with them.

"The pleasure is mutual," signalled Tom from the Western Union operating-room. The Pacific speaking with the Nile, through the Atlantic, the Bay of Biscay and the Mediterranean Sea is a wonderful feat.—San Francisco Call.

A Human Electric Light.

Some weeks ago Charles Baldwin, one of the best known men of Lexington, Ky., was seized with a sudden and peculiar illness, lasting several days. Physicians afforded no relief, and he recovered as suddenly as he became ill. On his recovery he noticed one evening that his body in the dark gave off a steady light, visible 100 yards. The light is so strong that when Baldwin is n ide an ordinary newspaper can be read by the light from his body at a distance of six feet. He is perfectly well and is not conscious of his power. Physicians say he is the wonder of the age.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Honey-moon.

"Say, Perkins, old boy, why don't we see you at the club any more? Has your mother-in-law shut down on you?" "No, Brown; the fact of the matter is, my home is so happy now that there is no inducement for me to leave it. You look incredulous, but it's a positive fact. You see, my wife used to suffer so much from functional derangements common to her sex that her spirits and her temper were greatly affected. It was not her fault, of course, but it made home unpleasant all the same. But now, since she has begun to take Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, she has been so well and so happy that we are having our honey-moon all over again.

Health in California.

"It is so healthy here," writes a settler in a southern California town, "that the only physician in the place will go two blocks out of his way rather than meet an undertaker, whose sad, reproachful gaze haunts him like the memory of a day spent in reading one of Howell's novels."—Chicago Tribune.

For the Year 1888

No better resolution can be made than to resist buying any of the substitutes offered as 'just as good" as the great only sure-pop corn cure—Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor. It never fails to give satisfaction. Beware of poisonous flesh eating substitutes.

Queen Victoria's New Wrap.

Among the Queen's Jubilee gifts there came from the Cape a cloak of ostrich feathers, whose like is not to be had for love or money, as it is made of the finest and glossiest feathers, stripped lengthwise from the stem and sewn in lapping rows upon net, making a mass, black, soft and warm as tropic darkness. The garment is lined throughout with finest black surah and reaches almost to the feet.

Northwest Wisdom.

You cannot judge editorials as you would Limberger cheese.—Regina Journal.

Trainmen on the Denver Pacific Road are puzzled by the appearance of an uncanny spectre, which haunts their trains at night. Its favorite prank is to perch itself on a freight car brake wheel, where it will sit for an hour at a time if unmolested. When a trainmen plucks up enough courage to approach the unwelcome visitor it jumps out into space and disappears.

The average Russian is said to drink from ten to twelve glasses of tea a day. Every Russian merchant has a tea-urn in his counting-room, and the lawyer or mechanic goes out to his cafe for tea as often as the German for beer or the Frenchman for wine. At the cafes at all hours of the day and night one can see crowds of people sipping tea.

A Secret

of good health is found in the regular movement of the bowels and perfect action of the Liver. These organs are intended by nature to remove from the system all impurities. If you are constipated, you offer a "standing invitation" to a whole family of diseases and irregularities which will surely be "accepted," and you will have guests unwelcome and determined. All these unhappy conditions may be averted by the timely use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. Powerful for the effectual regulation of the bowels and Liver, establishing a healthy action of the entire wonderful organism with which we are created.

"A Brooklyn lady has seen her husband only twice in thirty-five years." It is not stated how long she has been blind; or it may be that her husband is Grand District Deputy of about a dozen different secret societies and is out of town every day and night installing officers and forming new lodges.

ITCHING PILES.

Symptoms—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. Swayne's Ointment stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. Swayne's Ointment can be obtanedof druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

The Germans recently attempted a "minor mobilization" experiment near Metz. The railroad station master received at 1 o'clock an order to prepare coffee for 2,800 men at 4, and a dinner for the same number at 6.30. At 1 o'clock 2,800 men came in, had their coffee and took the train for another station, and at 6.30 the next 2,800 promptly appeared, dined and went to the next station, where they had coffee, and both parties returned to their quarters the next morning. The attempt was highly successful.

WHAT AILS YOU?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Diseases, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

Dr Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

CURES ALL HUMORS,

from common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands. Send ten cents in stamps for a large Treatise, with colored plates, on Skin Diseases, or the same amount for a Treatise on Scrofulous Affections.

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse it by using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, vital strength and bodily health will be established.

CONSUMPTION,

which is Scrofula of the Lungs, is arrested and cured by this remedy, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease. From its marvelous power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now world-famed remedy to the public, Dr. Pierce thought seriously of calling it his "Consumption Cure," but abandoned that name as too restrictive for a medicine which, from its wonderful combination of tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, anti-bilious, pectoral, and nutritive properties, is unequaled, not only as a remedy for Consumption, but for all Chronic Diseases of the Liver, Blood, and Lungs.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Severe Coughs, and kindred affections, it is an efficient remedy.

Sold by Druggists, at $1.00, or Six Bottles for $5.00.

An open meeting of the Lit. Soc. of the Division street Presbyterian church was held last week. The debate was: "Resolved that woman should have equal rights with man." Messrs. Dr. Dow and McKay spoke eloquently on the affirmative, and were opposed by Messrs. Chricton and Skeene. Decision was granted in favor of the affirmative. Mrs. Dr. McCullough sang with much feeling, "The Four Marys." Miss A. Dobie gave a reading entitled, 'The District Fathers' which was enjoyed by all. Mrs. F. LePan's recitation, "Christmas in the Poor House," was well rendered. Miss M. Mitchell gave several instrumental solos during the evening. Miss Smith opened and closed the meeting with suitable hymns.

Rev. A. H. Scott, pastor of Knox church (Presbyterian) has received a call to Perth from the Presbytery of Lanark and Renfrew. Mr. Scott is highly esteemed and beloved by his present congregation and his contemplated departure fills his flock with feelings of sadness. We understand that Perth is near the home of his parents and as he is also offered an additional $400, together with a manse, we see no good reason why the change should not be looked upon favorably.

It was choir practice night in the O. S. Methodist church. Evidently from the disgusted expression on the young warblers' faces, something was wrong. Too true; gas was escaping somewhere. By-and-by the sexton made his appearance in the body of the church, and, squinting one eye up at the choir, inchoired in sepulchral voice: "Does any one smell gas?" "I gas we do," was the reply of a young gentleman. Then there was deep silence, broken only by the occasional groans of those upon whom it would fall to pronounce the doom of the perpetrator of such a pun!

From our own Correspondent.

I had intended to give your readers a report of the soiree held in this place last Friday, but as there was a special correspondent here on that occasion, I refrain from so doing. After the soiree a number of the young folks congregated at the hotel and "tripped the light fantastic" until the morning beams began to guild the distant hill-tops.

There is one subject, Mr. Editor, upon which I can remain silent no longer. I refer to the conduct at church on Sunday evenings. There are a few young men, sons of respectable parents, who would be insulted if any one called them anything else but gentlemen. Now, in my opinion, they are far from meriting that honor or respect. Last Sunday evening while the good man was engaged in solemn devotion, these individuals were talking and laughing loud enough to be distinctly heard all over the church, to the annoyance of all who wished to worship. They appear, also, to postpone their afternoon chew of the filthy weed until they enter church and then they make a bee, so that it is a continual splatter from their filthy mouths, which would lead one to believe that a half pint of the essence of tobacco was being deposited on the floor. In my humble opinion no gentleman will desecrate the house of God with his foul expectorations of tobacco juice. Now, young man, if you must spit, for decency's sake use your hat or your pocket for a spitoon and do not pollute the church with your filthy excretions. And, moreover, I would also suggest, that you invite your mothers to accompany you to keep you orderly while divine service is going on. If this is not sufficient, other means will probably be tried, so take warning in time.

Death of Mr. Purdy.

Mr. Wm. Purdy, P. M. at Flesherton Station, departed this life on Wednesday of last week. Mr. R. H. Cook, who was with him to the last, says he passed away peacefully, being perfectly conscious up to the very moment of his death. He spoke cheerfully about divine things, and talked frequently about his past life. Deceased had been ailing for some months. His remains were interred in the cemetery near Priceville on Friday.

Banking Facilities.

The rapid increase of business in Flesherton, and the constant additions to our many healthy business enterprises, call loudly for better banking facilities. This is an excellent centre for working up an extensive and sound outside business, also, as any person, with "half an eye" will perceive at a glance. If we cannot induce some chartered monetary concern to locate a branch here, why by all means let us encourage a similar institution to that so carefully and shrewdly managed by Mr. Wm. Lucas in Markdale.

Hymeneal.

Mr. Guy Blakely, of Blakely Bros., Flesherton, commenced business in proper shape when he took unto himself an amiable and estimable young lady partner, on Wednesday of last week, in the person of Miss Minnie A. Parks, of this Township. The pleasant event occurred at the residence of the bride's parents in what is known as the Tyrone settlement, and the nuptial knot was firmly and scripturally tied by Rev. Mr. McCaul, Presbyterian minister at Proton Station. Mr. Joseph Parks was groomsman, and Miss Alice Boyd was bridesmaid. The bride's costume was handsome and chaste. We wish the happy couple all manner of success in life.

Into Business Again.

Our good friend, Mr. Joseph Smith, has not let the grass grow under his feet since his premises were destroyed by fire. His many customers will now find him ready to fill all orders promptly, and in his usual excellent manner, in the shop formerly occupied by Mr. T. Duncan, tailor, on Sydenham street. Mr. Smith enjoys a good reputation as a boot and shoemaker and we trust he will get sufficient patronage—over and above his regular business—to enable him the better to sustain his recent severe loss. Mr. Smith would like those owing him to pay him on or before the 1st of April without fail, and it is to be hoped they will see to it that he is not disappointed.

A Sunday to be Remembered.

The services in the Methodist church, Flesherton, on Sunday last were of special interest, and were largely attended. Rev. Mr. Shilton delivered two sound and eloquent Gospel sermons morning and evening. Added to these were the services of song, conducted by Mrs. J. Shilton, of Georgetown. It is difficult to describe the singing of this gifted vocalist. Her voice is one of surpassing sweetness and volume, while there is an utter absence of that "trilling" affectation so common in celebrated vocalists. Her accentuation is faultless and her powers of expression indescribably pathetic. As she sang, many wept, and a thrill ran through the congregation like a mighty electric current. It was not mere sentiment—the singing came from the heart, and many hearts beat responsive to the soul-stirring strains. God blesses such song—song that tends to elevate man and make him better.

Brother J. M. Webster Heard From.

We were favored this week with the San Francisco Journal of Commerce's special edition on British Columbia. It is truly a mammoth number and paints the future prospects of the province by the Western sea in glowing colors. Our old and esteemed friends, Mr. J. M. Webster, sent us the paper. While opening it out, a darning needle—with a particularly sharp point—dropped from its folds upon the floor. We suppose friend Webster desires thus to convey forcibly to our mind the fact, that the Yankee newspaper publishers are sharp, enterprising and thrifty fellows. Seeing that they have completely outgeneralled the home publishers—in the matter of widely and effectually advertising the resources and future prospects of British Columbia—this fact must be patent to all. They have also raked in numerous shekels as the reward for their enterprise, as is amply testified by the enormous advertising patronage.

Some Day.

You say your love will never die,
But strong as ever hold its sway;
I bet you whisper o'er the words,
But time will tell some day—some day.

You love me now—I doubt it not;
We love each other, so we say,
But all those throbbings of our hearts
Will cease, I know full well, some day.

And yet, if I should leave you now,
Or you should turn for e'er away,
Would we not mourn our severed lives
And yearn to meet again some day?

Then what is love? Is it a toy
Which serves to pass dull hours away?
A trifle which we long to own
Then wearied, cast it by, some day?

No matter. It is best, I deem,
To pull the roses while we may,
And wiser to forget the end
The end, when love shall die, some day.

A LOVE MATCH.

Prince Oscar's Marriage to Miss Munck in England.

ROMANTIC SWEDISH COURTSHIP.

A London cable says: There was a very large number of guests at the wedding of Prince Oscar of Sweden and Miss Munck at Bournemouth yesterday. The Queen of Sweden, Prince Carl and Prince Eugene of Sweden, the Crown Princess of Denmark and the Duchess of Albany were present. The weather was brilliant.

The marriage of Prince Oscar of Sweden with Miss Ebba Munck, one of the maids of honor to his Royal mother, Queen Sophia, and the young man's renunciation of all his rights, prerogatives and titles in order to wed the woman he loves, have been a severe shock to the royalties of Europe and all those who believe with the late Prince Windisschnatz of Austria, that "man only begins with a baron." With the people of Sweden and Norway, however, by whom the Prince has always been greatly admired and beloved on account of his manly qualities, this last step has but added to his popularity.

Prince Oscar, Duke of Gotland, is the second son of King Oscar II., and was born November 15th, 1859. He is a young man of sterling character and an efficient officer in the Swedish service. He is of a religious disposition, a quality not often met with in princes, and devotes much of his time and money to the cause of charity. He has travelled extensively and has written a history of his travels in conjunction with his brother. His love affair with Miss Munck dates back for ten years, but not till recently did he divulge his feelings, even to Miss Munck herself. According to the Swedish Constitution any Prince of the Royal Family contracting a morganatic marriage must renounce his right to the succession to the Throne, together with all the titles, prerogatives and emoluments incident to his position. This Prince Oscar has done. It was only after much earnest and persevering effort that he obtained the Royal assent to his marriage with Miss Munck, and then it was owing mainly to the pleading of his mother.

Miss Munck is a descendant of a family long known in the history of Sweden. One of the most remarkable of the family was Adolph Frederick Munck, a favorite and courtier of Gustave III. Owing to court intrigue he was forced to fly to Italy in 1792, where he died an Italian count at the age of 82 years. The principal member of the family to-day is Captain Eugene Munck, of the Swedish navy, who resides at Stockholm. His father, Col. Munck, had a half brother, Lieut.-Col. K. J. Munck, who married twice, the second time with Baroness Henrietta Cederstrom. Two children were born of this marriage—B. Munck, 1857, now lieutenant in a cavalry regiment in Smaland, and Ebba Henrietta Munck, the betrothed of Prince Oscar, born Oct. 24th, 1858. Her father, now dead, was colonel of a cavalry regiment in the army, and afterwards postmaster of Jonkopings. Her mother is still living at Stockholm. Miss Munck was chosen in 1882 as a maid of honor to the Crown Princess and occupied her place at court till 1886. She then left and devoted herself to nursing the sick in the Queen's Hospital, an institution built through the munificence of Her Majesty the Queen of Sweden. Miss Munck was betrothed some years ago to Lieut. Count Valdemar von Rosen, but the engagement was broken off at the instance of Miss Munck, who, according to gossip, did not approve of the Count's rather gay life.

The betrothal between His Highness Prince Oscar and Miss Munck took place January 29th in the royal palace, Stockholm. After the young couple, in the presence of their Royal Highnesses the King and Queen, had exchanged rings, the King, Queen, Crown Prince and Crown Princess followed the affianced pair to the Queen's appartments where the invited guests were assembled. The King there publicly announced the betrothal and toasted the young couple in the presence of the invited guests, who included Miss Munck's nearest relatives, the Swedish and Norwegian Prime Ministers, the court functionaries, the diplomatic corps, and the tutors and military comrades of Prince Oscar. Prince Oscar and wife will be known after their marriage as Prince and Princess Bernadotte, the Prince's family name.

A New Prima Donna.

A London correspondent writes: "I have just had the privilege of seeing and hearing the singing of a young Scotch lady whom Mr. Augustus Harris has engaged as a prima donna for his opera season, which is to commence in May. Her name is Macintyre and she is the daughter of a general officer residing at Brighton. Many connoisseurs are enthusiastic about her voice, pronouncing her the best debutante since Nilsson, whom she somewhat resembles. She is sweetly pretty and pronouncedly Scotch alike in feature, complexion and build. Her lower register is exquisite, but she can also command those high notes which bring down the gallery."

A Statue of Lord Dufferin.

A London despatch says: The Dufferin Memorial Committee at Calcutta has decided to place in front of the Town Hall a statue of Lord Dufferin and within the hall a portrait of Lady Dufferin. The native opposition to this project has all along been and is still very strong, but the committee voted almost unanimously to thus honor the retiring Viceroy in spite of the objections raised.

A New York despatch says: The suit of Miss Lucy A. Case, a widow, against Wm. E. English, of Indianapolis, son of ex-Governor Wm. H. English, for seduction and breach of promise of marriage, has been settled out of court. It is stated that she received $15,000 and that all her expenses were paid.

THE KAISER'S FUNERAL.

Imposing Ceremonies at the Dead King's Funeral.

A Berlin cable says: The funeral of Emperor William took place to-day. The weather was again extremely cold, and the troops, who were ranged four deep along the route taken by the cortege, wore heavy cloaks. The low temperature had no apparent effect upon the people, and hundreds of thousands of spectators occupied the space behind the soldiers, while every window along the Unter den Linden was crowded. All the houses on the thoroughfare were covered with mourning and exhibited flags with black drapery. At the street crossings massive pillars draped with black and surmounted by Prussian eagles had been erected. The lamp-posts were covered with crape and at every fifty paces there were large candelabra bearing flaming crossets. The route of the funeral procession presented a most imposing aspect, entirely in keeping with the deep sorrow and reverence of the people. The centre of the road was strewn with gravel and fir branches. In the Penisor platz large crape festoons entwined with laurel were hung. The Brandenburg Gate was draped, and there was a large arch in front of it, upon which were the words, "God bless you." The funeral service took place in the cathedral in accordance with the programme. Emperor Frederick was not present, the weather being too severe to permit of his exposing himself. Dr. Koegel, the Court Chaplain, delivered the sermon, standing beside the coffin. His text was, "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace according to Thy word, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation." At 12.45 o'clock Dr. Koegel pronounced the benediction, while at the same time volleys were fired by infantry on the outside. The cathedral ceremony closed with the singing of "Holy, Holy is the Lord." The procession to escort the Kaiser's remains to the mausoleum then began to form.

Prince Bismarck and Gen. Von Moltke were not present at the services in the cathedral, nor did they take part in the procession to the mausoleum. The cathedral presented a most solemn and impressive appearance. When the soft organ prelude began the Court Chamberlain and the Ministers took positions behind tabourets bearing the Empire's insignia. Gen. Von Pape, holding the Imperial standard, then placed himself at the head of the coffin. Count Lehndoroff and Prince Radziwill, the late Emperor's aides-de-camp, with drawn swords, standing on each side of him, and the Adjutant-General and other aides-de-camp standing together at the foot of the coffin. While the organ still played the royalties entered, Prince William arriving at noon. At a signal from the chief master of ceremonies the organ broke into swelling tones and the service was begun. Prince William stood in the middle of the nave behind the imperial standard. Alongside of him were the King of Saxony, the King of Belgium and the King of Roumania. Close by stood the Grand Duke of Baden, Princes Albrecht and Henry, and other princes of the royal house of Prussia, the Prince Imperial of Austria, the Prince Imperial of Russia, the Grand Dukes Michael and Nicholas of Russia, the Prince of Wales, the Crown Prince of Italy, the Crown Prince of Denmark and the Crown Prince of Greece, all in the uniforms of their respective countries. The Princes of Bavaria, the Grand Duke of Hesse and other notables and foreign representatives, including Gen. Billot, of France, and his suite, formed the next rows in the nave. The diplomatic pew was crowded.

A FATHER'S REVENGE.

He Commits a Terrible Outrage on a Woman for Ruining His Son.

A Springfield (Mo.) despatch says: Dr. George M. Cox, U. S. pension examiner at Springfield, induced Effie Ellis, the mistress of Fenton Cox, the son of the physician, to enter a carriage with him, and when she was seated he struck her over the head with a bottle of vitriol, breaking the vessel and smearing her face and head with the fluid. Her screams attracted the attention of a policeman, who released her from the frenzied physician, but not until her eyes had been burned out and her handsome features destroyed. The agony of the poor creature is intense, and she now lies at the point of death. Fenton Cox met Effie at a Wisconsin watering place last summer and brought her to Springfield, where he has since pursued a course of debauchery and ruin. The doctor, by legal means, broke up a variety show which the boy had started, with Effie as leading lady, and drove her out of town; but the boy followed her to St. Louis. Before meeting Effie he had been a promising young man. His sudden ruin distracted his parents, and drove his father to commit his terrible crime.

THE MONTREAL SENSATION.

Trial of a Detective for Burglary—Startling Evidence by a G.T.R. Officer.

A Montreal despatch dated last (Friday) night says: The proceedings in the famous detective case were of a more interesting nature to-day, and some important testimony was adduced. Several witnesses were examined, but there was nothing in their evidence directly incriminating the accused. A sensation was produced when Detective Thos. Flynn, one of the principal witnesses, was called. He swore that he had known the prisoner for fourteen years, but did not know Naegle and Bureau before the 1st of December. Knew a person named Frank Wilson; first met Wilson in Detroit on Nov. 19th. Received a telegram from W. J. Spicer, General Manager of the Chicago & Grand Trunk Railway at Detroit, and met him there at his office. Mr. Spicer said, "I expect a man here in a short time. You may have to go to Montreal shortly." He also mentioned that it was in connection with the robbery at the Bonaventure that he wanted him. About 8 o'clock a man arrived at the office, who afterwards told him that his name was Frank Haynes, and that he was also known as Frank Wilson. Witness was with the general manager when this man arrived. It was arranged that Frank Wilson and witness should go to Montreal. His visit to Montreal was with the object, first, to have Wilson lay the matter before Mr. Hickson; and secondly, for the purpose of getting a letter which Wilson said was going to be sent to him at the Adams House, Boston. Wilson went to Boston and witness went to Colborne, where his family live. Did not follow witness to Boston. He saw Wilson in Boston on the 26th November. Went to Boston for the purpose of getting any letters that might be sent to Wilson and to witness him open them at the Adams House. It was arranged to try to get more letters from the same party. The clerk at the Adams House handed Wilson a letter, when Wilson said, "You open that letter, Flynn, and read it yourself." Witness then produced the incriminating letters, but a dispute arose as to whether they should be admitted as evidence or not, and the court took the matter en delibere.

HORRIBLE ATROCITY.

An Aged Woman Beaten to Death and Her Husband Left for Dead.

An Ithaca, N.Y., despatch says: Richard Barber, a farm hand employed by Thomas Donahue the past winter, was lodged in jail here this noon, charged with the most atrocious crime committed in this section in half a century. Richard Mason and his wife, an inoffensive, childless couple aged about 70, have lived for thirty years in a little house on two acres of land two miles east of Trumansburg. On Friday night an alarm at the door aroused Mason, who admitted Barber, with whom the Masons were well acquainted. Lighting a lamp, Mason started to go down in the cellar for a dish of apples. Barber seized a heavy stove poker or shaker and struck the old man on the head as he stood at the cellar door. Leaving him after a second blow, Barber went into the chamber where Mrs. Mason was lying in bed and hammered her to death with the same weapon. The fainting husband heard his wife's loud cries of agony subside into moans. The only heed paid by the miscreant to Mason's appeal for mercy for his wife and himself was a return to the onslaught on the husband. The murderer then emptied the contents of the oil lamp upon the old man and the carpet, and, igniting it, fled from the house. Mason recovered sufficiently to crawl from his house into a snow-drift, leaving the body of his dead wife for cremation in the blaze which soon consumed the house. The fire was discovered by neighbors, two of whom conveyed the mutilated farmer to an adjacent house, by which time the entire neighborhood had become aroused, and when Mason informed them of the facts, enraged parties of searchers set out to apprehend the murderer. Barber was encountered on the road and kept in custody by a throng of men until the arrival of Deputy Sheriff Barton, who succeeded in getting him to Trumansburg and protecting him until the train brought them to Ithaca. Barber is an Englishman and has been in this country eight years. The only theory accounting for the crime is alleged to be his knowledge that the Masons had $100 of their savings hoarded in the house.

A Locomotive Lost in the Quicksand.

"In the construction of the Kansas Pacific & Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe railroads," said H. L. Carter, a railroad contractor of St. Joseph, the other day, "one difficulty of frequent occurrence was met with, which, as far as my experience goes, is unique in railroad history. I refer to the trouble arising from quicksands. From Western Kansas to the mountains quicksands are to be found in nearly every stream, no matter how small, and to successfully bridge them required an expenditure out of all proportion to the size of stream to be crossed. We tried pile-driving, but the longest piles disappeared without touching bottom. Then filling with earth and stone was attempted and met with equally poor success, as the quicksand was apparently capable of swallowing the Rocky Mountains. The only means of crossing a quicksand was found to be to build short truss bridges across them. As an instance of the practically bottomless nature of the quicksands, I may cite the case of an engine that ran off the track at River Bend, about ninety miles from Denver, on the Kansas Pacific. The engine, a large freight, fell into a quicksand and in twenty minutes had entirely disappeared. Within two days the company sent out a gang of men and a wrecking train to raise the engine. To their surprise they could not find a trace of it. Careful search was made, magnified rods were sunk to the depth of sixty-five feet, but no engine could be found. It had sunk beyond human ken, and from that day to this has never been discovered.—Wichita Beacon.

Last year the Church of England raised half a million sterling for Church extension, restoration, endowment of benefices, provision of burial grounds and erection of parsonages. The annual average of confirmations for the nine years ending with 1883 was 166,000, while that for the succeeding three years was nearly 204,000—a growth of over 22 per cent. The confirmations for 1886 reached 213,638.

ODD DELUSIONS.

Singular Instances of Monomania in Persons Who are Otherwise Perfectly Sane.

Among the instances of singular monomania which I have discovered is that of an important officer of a State government in New England. His special delusion is that the other members of the family are insane and are plotting to injure him, and that they ought to be put in an asylum. He is an able and even celebrated lawyer, and conducts cases with marked effectiveness and success, his briefs and arguments showing unusual vigor and continuity of thought. Nobody knows of his mental condition outside of his own family and a few intimate friends, to whom they have said confidently: "If any of us should disappear suddenly, look for us in an asylum."

Another most curious case is that of a wealthy banker of New York city, who fancies that he is a ripe cherry that the birds are eager to pick. He has a terror of all fruit-eating birds, and seldom walks or appears anywhere in the open air. He makes his trips to and from his bank in a carriage and keeps the doors and windows always shut tight, lest a sparrow should get in and swallow him! He knows perfectly well that the preposterous belief would damage him and probably ruin him if it were generally known that he harbored it, so he conceals the consciousness of his fearful peril from his business associates and contents himself with keeping carefully out of the way of birds.

An interesting society lady of Troy imagines that a big Newfoundland dog always accompanies her, walks when she walks, stops when she stops. "I know perfectly well that it is not there," she says, "but I always see it, and that is what troubles me." When I go to bed it always lies down upon my feet."

There is a lady who has been a teacher for the last twelve years in the schools of New York city, and is still so employed, who imagines herself a wheelbarrow. "I know I am not a wheelbarrow, of course," she says to her physician, Dr. Hammond, "but that certainly makes no difference with the appearance and my sensations. When in school I am always a wheelbarrow, and my feet are the handles and my head is the wheel, and I seem to be trundling myself down the aisles and through the halls. It is ridiculous and painful and mortifying, but, though I know it is the result of a nervous disease, I cannot shake off the hallucination."

Mr. W. A. Croffut, a journalist and successful mesmerist, gives me the following opinion: "Hallucinations are evidently closely akin to dreams. I can fill any one of my sensitives full of delusions in a minute; can make him think he is Washington or Grant or Victoria, a peddler, an opera singer, a teacher of languages, a rooster or a telegraph pole, and can banish the delusion in two seconds. Now, it seems to me that this hallucination is exactly the same kind as the hallucination of lunatics or the dreams of those who sleep, the only difference being that the sleeper holds the key of dreamland and the operator holds the key of a similar trance called mesmerism, while to the permanent trance called insanity and the partial trance called monomania the key is lost. I have wondered if it might not be possible to recover the lost key—to often waken the insane from their dream as somnambulists and the mesmerized are wakened."—Pittsburg Press New York Letter.

Just Like a Woman.

"You and your husband should settle these little tronbles between yourselves," said the minister, "and not come to me. From what you have said I should judge you were rather obstinate." "Oh, no," she replied, "indeed I'm not. But I must admit I always like to have my own way."—Judge.

It is not generally known that Phil Armour, the Chicago pork man, was one of the Argonauts who crossed the plains in '49 in search of the golden fleece. He remained in California for several years and laid the foundation of his fortune in 1851 by establishing a water works for the miners. He came east to Milwaukee in 1857 and remained there until he removed to Chicago.

The question of Ministerial Inefficiency, which has been creating so much discussion in Scotland, has not hitherto been publicly dealt with in the courts of the English Presbyterian Church. This silence is to be observed no longer. The subject is to be brought before the Newcastle Presbytery at its ordinary meeting in March by Rev. James Mackenzie, of South Shields, who will move the transmission of an overture to the Synod thereon. Other Presbyteries are expected to move in the same direction.

At Tunbridge Wells, on a recent Sunday the Rev. Father Searle delivered a lecture in reply to a recent address by Lord Robert Montagu, in the same town. In the course of his address he stated that the Queen's mother, the Duchess of Kent, as Cardinal Wiseman told him in 1862 at St. Leonard's in an interesting conversation, was received into the Catholic Church before her death.

VICTIMS OF THE LOCOMOTIVE.

What One Engineer Has Killed on the Track—Everything from Toads to Men.

"I killed a buzzard this morning," remarked an old engineer of the Georgia Road to an Atlanta Constitution reporter the other afternoon.

"Rather strange game to be hunting with a locomotive. How did it happen?"

"A dog or something had been killed the day before, and the buzzard was so interested in the carcass that he didn't take any notice of me until I got right upon him, and he was knocked off into the ditch. I hit him a pretty hard lick, and I guess it killed him."

"Isn't it an unusual occurrence to run over birds and the like?"

"O no, not at all; we frequently kill partridges, doves and sparrows without number. Sometimes a whole bevy of chickens are ground up at one time. Although all kinds of poultry are run over from time to time, I believe guineas are smartest in getting out of the way. When a flock of them is encountered on a track they usually strike out on a run directly ahead of you, sticking to the track until you get right upon them, and then dart off to one side. If one gets off the rest follow. I never knew it to fail. If you get one of them, you get the whole flock."

"How is it with other animals? I guess you have run over nearly every kind in your time?"

"Yes, I reckon I have," said the engineer, thoughtfully, a shadow passing over his kindly face as he finished the sentence. "I suppose I have run over everything from a man to a toad."

"One day I was running at a high speed, considerably behind time. Just as I turned a curve a colored man, seated on a load of wood and driving a mule, was crossing the track ahead of me. Although he had ample time to get over, I involuntarily shut off the steam and threw on the brakes. It was too late, however. The poor fellow became frightened and struck his mule a blow with a switch, and the stubborn animal came to a dead stop right in his tracks. The man was paralyzed with fear and unable to move. The next instant I struck the waggon and knocked it into a thousand pieces, carrying the unfortunate man more than thirty yards before I could stop. The mule plodded on the road as unconcernedly as though he were still attached to his load and nothing had happened.

"But, speaking of animals," continued the engineer, "sheep seem to have less sense than anything else. If a flock of them should happen to be grazing near the track when a train comes along, and they don't manage to get in the way of it, it won't be their fault. I have killed as many as a dozen at a time. We don't kill many nowadays, though, because there are very few in the country.

"Goats are just the opposite. I have never killed more than one or two. They are smart enough to get out of the way from the time they are two days old. Let one be in the way of an approaching engine, and when he wants to get off the track that is just what he does, and without any foolishness either. If he should happen to be in a cut he starts right up the bank, and gets there, too.

"While running a freight one night I ran into a drove of about half a dozen horses. It was quite dark, and I could see them only when I would get close upon them. With their characteristic stupidity under such circumstances, the frightened animals made straight ahead of me at the top of their speed. I suppose I ran them in this way for several miles, sometimes stopping entirely to let them out of the way, but whenever I reached a descending grade I would be upon them again. At last they were caught and two of them killed before the rest got off the track.

"A good many hogs and cattle were also killed on the track. Of course, these all have to be paid for, and there is something remarkable in the fact that only Jerseys, Berkshires and the like are so unfortunate as to get in our way. Whenever a cow does get off the track and out of danger we have no reason to be gratified, because we know she is only a scrub, and of no value anyway."

BERTIE.

The Boy Who Got His Mother and Himself Into a Great Deal of Trouble.

Mrs. Shamm gave a small but very elegant tea the other evening, and, as a reward for being good for two hours, she allowed her son Bertie, aged 10, to sit at table with the guests. As an example of cold-blooded villainy, says the Detroit Free Press, we give a few of the remarks made by Master Bertie during the progress of the meal:

"Ma," he asked first, "whose spoons are these?"

"Hush, dear," said Mrs. Shamm.

He hushed for a second, then:

"Ma, whose big glass dish is that?"

"Little boys should be seen and not heard," said Mrs. Shamm, with a sickly smile that did not conceal from the guests the fact that there was a fearful reckoning in store for Bertie on their departure.

"Say, ma," he put in, interrupting old Mrs. Moneyweight, who was the special guest of the occasion, "that ain't our silver cake basket, is it?"

"Bertie, didn't you hear Mrs. Moneyweight speaking?" chides his distressed parent.

"Well, I'll be quiet if you'll tell me whose pretty glasses those are. They're Mrs. Baxter's, ain't they?"

"Bertie!"

"Oh, ma, I forgot to tell you that Mrs. Hooker wants you to be sure and send back her teaspoons to-night, and—oh, ma, did you know that Sally broke one of Mrs. Walker's nice teacups, and—oh, what a pretty plate this is! Who does it belong to?"

The doors had hardly closed on the last guest when the neighbors were apprised by a sound whose import could not be mistaken that Bertie's time of reckoning had come.

A correspondent, writing from Havana, says that he never saw a people so clean in regard to their dress. A Cuban stevedore will load molasses on a vessel for a week and one can hardly find a spot upon his white suit when Saturday night comes. The clerks in Havana look as if they had just stepped out of bandboxes. They are usually dressed in patent leather gaiters, silk stockings and linen trousers and shirts that are spotlessly white.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

The following Bills were read a third time:

To amend the Act incorporating the Ottawa & Thousand Island Railway Company—Mr. Fraser.

To regulate the closing of shops and the hours of labor therein for children and young persons—Mr. Fraser.

To amend the Act respecting the income and property of the University of Toronto, University College and Upper Canada College—Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

To amend the Act incorporating the Brockville, Westport & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Company—Mr. Fraser.

To amend the Act respecting the Parry Sound Colonisation Railway Company—Mr. Armstrong.

Mr. Wood (Brant) moved for an order of the House for a return showing the location of each Mechanics' Institute, Farmers' Institute and free library in the Province, with the number of subscribers or members of each and the amount of money annually expended by the Province for their support. He advocated generally an extension of the system of free libraries in country districts, which were not included as a rule, he contended, in the districts benefitted by Mechanics' Institutes.

Hon. Mr. Ross (Middlesex) thought Mechanics' Institutes were, as a rule, patronized considerably by others than these living in the municipality in which they existed. He thought the extension of the system of Mechanics' Institutes was really the best way of meeting the difficulty suggested by the hon. gentleman. He would point out the noteworthy fact that of the total of 330,000 books issued last year by Mechanics' Institutes, 171,000 were works of fiction, and it was a question worthy of some thought how much further the Government might go in aiding these or similar institutions, the result being as he had stated. The suggestion of the area of distribution of Governmental reports being largely extended would no doubt be considered by the Minister of Agriculture. He had no objection to the motion passing.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton) moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the Division Courts Act. He said that the object of the Bill was to take away from Division Court Judges the odious power of imprisonment for debt and to put Division Court debtors on precisely the same footing as judgment debtors in regard to imprisonment. In the Superior Courts a judgment debtor might be examined, but he believed that even if he swore that he had the money in his pocket to pay the judgment, that was not considered such an unsatisfactory answer as would subject him to imprisonment.

Mr. Meredith suggested that if this was law, which he doubted, it was a bad law.

Mr. Gibson said that might be, but no one would propose to give the Supreme Courts the power of imprisonment for refusing or neglecting to pay a debt, the power now possessed by Division Court Judges. Some refrained almost entirely from exercising the power of imprisonment, other enforcing what was virtually imprisonment for debt.

Hon. C. F. Fraser said that his hon. friend's strongest point was the distinction drawn betwen the large and the small debtor. But he believed that if the small debtor were placed on exactly the same footing as the large debtor, he would be in a very much worse position than he is to-day. For instance, a large debtor might be restrained from leaving the country, while the Division Court debtor might go where he pleased. The present law did not allow imprisonment for debt as it was in the old days. Imprisonment could take place only after a judicial investigation, and as a matter of fact the cases of imprisonment were extremely few. He had, however, always considered that it was an extreme hardship for a man to be imprisoned on the ground that when he had incurred the debt he had no expectation of being able to pay it, and he would have no objection to the law being amended in that respect.

Mr. Meredith said that he did not see that a man who stole bread for his family was any worse than a man who stole under pretence of incurring a debt. "There is a certain kind of genteel scalawag that you can't reach except by this law."

Mr. O'Connor was inclined to agree with Mr. Meredith, but thought it was a hardship to make a judgment debtor lose a day's work by being examined.

The Bill was read the second time.

Mr. Garson's Bill to amend the Municipal Act was read the second time.

Mr. Graham moved the second reading of a Bill establishing a standard for milk. He took occasion to deny that farmers are much given to adulterating milk. The Bill was read the second time and committed.

Mr. Ballantyne's Bill to prevent frauds in connection with the supply of milk to cheese and butter factories was read a second time.

Hon. Mr. Mowat moved the second reading of the Bill to establish Manhood Suffrage for the Legislative Assembly. He was glad, he said, that both sides of the House were agreed as to the propriety of this Bill. There were some persons who considered Manhood Suffrage as tantamount to a system of Socialism, but those who had studied the matter and had watched the working of Manhood Suffrage in other countries would not share these apprehensions. The proposal had been mooted as early as 1874, but had been opposed by both parties. Recently the Conservative Opposition had determined to adopt manhood suffrage as a part of their policy and had last session moved an amendment to the Government Bill on the franchise, declaring in favor of it. This step was, however, a mere bit of party strategy, as the Conservatives had never adopted the principle of the Bill. The Government had determined to bring in the measure as soon as the country demanded it, and this Bill was but the finale of a series of successive steps in enlarging the franchise, all of which had been made by the Reformers. Universal suffrage in the United States had worked grave evils, no doubt, but it had probably evoked great good. Even some of the nations of Europe had adopted it, namely, Germany, France, Switzerland, Denmark and Italy. In the Province of Ontario at present the suffrage was very near manhood, and practically few were deprived of the franchise. He explained details of the Bill which enfranchises every male of 21 years, subject of Her Majesty, duly entered on the voters' lists and not disqualified by law.

Mr. Meredith repudiated the assertion made by the Attorney-General that motions to the effect of providing for manhood suffrage placed on the records of the House on previous occasions had been dictated by partisan motives. The Opposition had been consistent throughout in seeking manhood suffrage.

Mr. Waters contended that the Attorney-General should have gone one step forward and extended the franchise to women. He had deferred moving the second reading of his own Bill until after this one had been read, and he would now give timely warning that he would bring up the Bill granting the franchise to unmarried women and widows on Tuesday.

Mr. Garsen hoped the Government would soon be in a position to grant universal suffrage.

Stories of Railroad Men.

A gentleman who was upon the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway while the railway was under construction remembers an incident or two. General Manager Egan of the Chicago, St. Paul & Kansas City Railroad was at that time a Canadian Pacific superintendent, while Mr. James Ross was a Superintendent of Construction. Mr. Egan made a trip to the mountains to inspect the construction work and when he returned east Ross hitched his car on behind Egan's, as he also wanted to come east. While going down a steep grade the buffer of Ross' car rode up on top of the buffer of the car in front with a suddenness that brought Ross out on to the platform with the exclamation, "Here, what's the matter now?" "O nothing," replied Egan, who had in the meantime come out of his own quarters, "except that the rear car is imitating its occupants and wants to ride over everybody and everything." As Ross was just that kind of a fellow, the story was made the most of when it got around among the railroad men. One time Ross ordered the engineers out in the mountains to prepare their estimates and all meet him at a certain place. When he went out to see them there was only one of the engineers on hand with the estimates. All the others had taken a voluntary holiday and were off somewhere together in one of the mountain fastnesses, having a high old time. The lonesome but faithful engineer was congratulating himself that he had made himself "solid" with his employers by his exceptional attention to business, when Ross gruffly demanded: "Do you drink whiskey?" "No, sir," meekly replied the solitary engineer. "Well, then, do you eat hay?" asked Ross. "No, sir," was again the reply. "Then if you don't do either," said Ross, "you are not fit to associate with either man or beast; we don't want you around here." Was that engineer paralyzed? He was.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Shipped as Cabin Boy to Meet Her Lover.

Captain Robert Crombie, of the British ship Port Jackson, which recently sailed for Newcastle, New South Wales, related rather an extraordinary story of some of his friends during his stay in this port on his last trip. He says that the first trip he made out of Aberdeen he took with him a cabin boy who had approached him before sailing and pleaded for the position. The captain did not want him, but owing to his persistence, the youth was received on board, as he said that he was determined to go to Australia, the destination of the ship. An engagement was made, and the new cabin boy was taken along. Soon after arriving in Australia the boy deserted. Nothing more was heard of him until the captain arrived in this city. While driving in Golden Gate Park he came upon a handsome couple in an elegant turnout. The lady recognised him.

"Captain, I was your cabin boy. Don't you remember me?" she asked.

"Of course," replied the captain, stammeringly.

"This is my husband, Count Vig Koltz."

In chorus they added: "We thank you for your kindness," and rode off.—San Francisco Examiner.

A Journalistic Mark Tapley.

The Peterboro' Times of Wednesday says: Here we are a community of civilized and progressive people completely cut off from all communication with the outside world. Nine dead engines between here and Myrtle and three or four loafing around at different points on the Grand Trunk. They can't move; no coal, no fire, no go. We haven't had a mail since Monday afternoon. Of course in the matter of newspapers we are well supplied, as editors can always imagine what's going on so long as they have a pair of scissors and any old newspapers handy. This paper has got to come out anyway, even if we have to fall back on the almanacs and railroad timetables for copy. But we are not stuck yet. We have last week's Bobcaygeon Independent, a copy of Kendall's Spavin Cure, and the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

EMPEROR FREDERICK.

The New German Kaiser, His Life, His Wars and His Ways.

Frederick William Nicholas Charles, who succeeds his father as King of Prussia and German Emperor, was born on October 18th, 1831, and was the only son of the Emperor William I. and the Empress Augusta. His early life, like that of most princes, was uneventful. His mother directed his earlier education, and from her he received a most careful training, not only in those things pertaining naturally to the education of princes, but in all branches of study. The Empress Augusta was well qualified for her task, being a woman of great cultivation. On the 25th of January, 1858, the Prince married the Princess Victoria Adelaide Mary Louise, eldest daughter of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert of Coburg and Gotha and Princess Royal of Great Britain and Ireland. The Princess, who now becomes the German Empress, is nine years younger than her husband, having been born on November 21st, 1840. They have had eight children. Prince Sigismund died in 1866, while the Crown Prince was gaining laurels on the field of Koniggratz, and Prince Waldemar died in March, 1879, at the age of 12 years. The surviving children are as follows:

I. Prince Frederick William Victor Albert (known as Prince William), Crown Prince of Prussia and Prince Imperial of Germany. He was born on January 27th, 1859, married on February 27th, 1881, to Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein-Augustenburg, who was born on May 3rd, 1860. They have four children: Prince Frederick William, born on May 6th, 1882; Prince Frederick, born on July 7th, 1883; Prince Adal Adalbert, born on July 14th, 1884; and Prince August William, born on January 29th, 1887.

II. Princess Charlotte, who was born on July 24th 1860. She was married on February 18th, 1878, to Prince Bernard, eldest son of Duke George II., of Saxe-Meiningen. They have a daughter, Princess Feodora, born on May 12th, 1879.

III. Prince Henry, who was born on August 14th, 1862. He was betrothed on March 22nd, 1887, to Princess Irene of Hesse, daughter of the Grand Duke Louis IV.

IV. Princess Victoria, who was born on April 12th, 1866.

V. Princess Sophie Dorothea, who was born on June 14th, 1870.

VI. Princess Marguerite, who was born on April 22nd, 1872.

On January 25th, 1883, the Crown Princess and the Princess Victoria celebrated their silver wedding.

In the first year of his married life the Prince was made a major-general in the Prussian army. He was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general in 1860, and took command of the Second (Pomeranian) corps d'armee. At the head of this corps he took part in the war against Denmark, his cousin, Prince Frederick Charles, having command of the Prussian forces. When the war with Austria broke out in 1866, the Prince was placed in command of the Army of the Oder and brilliantly opened the campaign. The general operations of the war were conducted by Gen. von Moltke, but enough liberty was accorded to the Crown Prince to enable him to display high qualities of generalship.

At the beginning of the Franco-German war in 1870, the Crown Prince was placed in command of the third army, consisting of the 5th, 6th and 11th Prussian corps d'armee, the Bavarians and Wurtembergers and the troops of Baden and Hesse-Darmstadt. This force comprised 172,000 infantry, 17,000 cavalry and 576 guns. It was to this army that the city and garrison of Paris surrendered. The king's bulletin announcing the first Prussian victory gave to the Crown Prince his most popular name, "Our Fritz," which will probably cling to him during his life. It was eagerly caught up by the soldiers, who were devotedly attached to their gallant commander. The Prince fully merited this devotion, not only by the genius with which he conducted his operations, but by the care and kindness which he bestowed upon his troops.

The new Emperor has long been recognized as a judicious statesman, a moderate Liberal and a steady advocate of peace. His serious illness, now of many months' duration, is a matter of current knowledge and interest in the public mind.—New York Tribune.

A Lantern for Human Throats.

The young English electrician to whose ingenuity, I believe, Mr. Irving owed the cleverly-contrived effect of the sparks which fly from the blade of Mephisto's sword in "Faust," has been further proving what I may call his electric versatility. His latest invention, I understand, turns electricity to account as an aid to laryngoscopical examination by means of a tiny electric lamp, which is actually put down the throat of the patient. It was with this novel electric apparatus which Mr. Vesey has invented that Sir Morell Mackenzie examined the throat of the Crown Prince. The lamp is appended at the end of what looks like a long, slender penholder, and the proportionately small battery which supplies the electricity is worn about the examining surgeon's neck.—London Figaro.

Flossie's Prayer.

(Chicago News of Tuesday.)

Monroe—March 10th, 1888, at the residence of John Rosenberg, Flossie, only child of Cassie and Peter Monroe, aged 6 years 1 month and 4 days. Funeral from house Sunday, March 11th, 2 o'clock, to Rose Hill Cemetery. She was a God-loving child; her little prayer was always: "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild, look down upon a little child."

Oh, how we loved her
None but us can tell,
But God, who loved her better,
Has taken her home to dwell.

Maddened by Drink.

The Blackburn (Eng.) Times says that the German brigantine Apollo, of Hamburg, arrived in the Downs the other day, and landed at Deal a passenger, named Peters, who had driven himself mad with drink. While in this state he chawed off two of his fingers, and actually ate them. The man will have to be sent to an asylum.

EMPHATIC GUARANTEES

Which Are Justified by an Extraordinary Public Experience.

TO THE PUBLIC:

Having branch houses and laboratories in seven different quarters, and therefore having a world-wide experience, we, H. H. Warner & Co., justify ourselves in making the following statements:

OUR THEORY PROVED.

First.—For the past decade we have held that 93 per cent. of diseases originate in the kidneys which introduce uric acid into the system, a poison that is injurious to every organ, attacking and destroying first the organs which are weakest. We have also held that if the kidneys are kept in perfect health most of the ordinary ailments will be preaented, or, if contracted, cured. Other practitioners have held that extreme kidney disease was incurable. We have proof to the contrary, however, in hundreds of thousands of cases in every section of the globe. Warner's Safe Cure is the greatest specific known. Its reputation is established everywhere, and its influence surpasses all other medicines.

HOW DISEASE CREEPS ON.

Second.—The kidneys being the sewers of the human system, it is impossible to keep the entire system in good working order unless these organs are doing their full duty. Most people do not believe their kidneys are out of order because they never give them any pain. It is a peculiarity of kidney disease that it may long exist without the knowledge of the patient or of the practitioner. It may be suspected if there is any gradual departure from ordinary health, which departure increases as age comes on, the kidney poison in the blood gradually undermining and destroying every organ.

SCIENTIFIC SPECIFICS.

Third.—We do not cure every known disease from one bottle. This is an impossibility. Warner's Safe Remedies include seven scientific specifics, each one of which has a specific purpose which the others cannot fully perform.

RECOGNIZED STANDARDS.

Fourth.—Warner's Safe Remedies have been recognized by the doctors and the people all over the globe, even in countries most conservative and most opposed to the manufacture of proprietary medicines, as standards of the highest excellence and worthy of the patronage of all people.

STRONG GUARANTEES.

Fifth.—We make the following unqualified guarantees:

GUARANTEE 1.—That Warner's Safe Remedies are pure and harmless.

GUARANTEE 2.—That the testimonials used by us are genuine, and so far as we know, absolutely true. We will forfeit $5,000 for proof to the contrary.

GUARANTEE 3.—Warner's Safe Remedies have permanently cured many millions of people whom the doctors have pronounced incurable. People who were cured ten years ago report the cure permanent and completely satisfactory. Warner's Safe Remedies will sustain every claim, if used sufficiently and as directed.

Sixth.—Ask your friends and neighbors what they think of Warner's Safe Cure. We do not ask you to believe us alone.

YOUR FRIENDS AND NEIGHBORS.

MRS. JAMES BURNS, of 18 Division st., Toronto, writes that her daughter was given up to die, by the best medical men in the city, from Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, but that Warner's Safe Cure not only saved her life but restored her to health.

L. A. BAKER, of Toronto, Supt. Fire Patrol Co. of Canada, suffered from lame back for three years. Physicians treated him for Bright's Disease, but he obtained no relief. Four bottles of Warner's Safe Cure made a well man of him.

W. J. HAMILTON, of Amherst, Nova Scotia, was cured of hemorrhage of the kidneys after doctors failed to cure him and the last dying rites of the church had been given him.

MRS. HAYWARD, of 321 Church st., Toronto, was cured of Chronic Dyspepsia with six bottles of Warner's Safe Cure.

JOHN GIVES, of Galt, is a living monument to the power of Warner's Safe Cure over Enlargement of the Liver.

We could give thousands of similar testimonials. Warner's Safe Cure does exactly as represented.

Seventh—We were forced into the manufacture of Warner's Safe Remedies in obedience to a vow made by Mr. H. H. Warner that he would, if the remedy now known as Warner's Safe Cure restored him to health, spread its merits before the entire world. In ten years the demand has grown so that laboratories have been established in seven quarters of the globe. Not only is Warner's Safe Cure a scientific specific—it cures when all the doctors fail, thousands of the best physicians prescribe it regularly, its power over disease is permanent and its reputation is of the most exalted character.

Potato Ivory.

Much of the so-called ivory now in use is simply potato. Brow-racking pains assail him.
Sick headache! But ere long comes ease,
His stomach settles into peace,
Within his head the throbbings cease—
Pierce's Pellets never fail him!

Nor will they fail any one in such a dire predicament. To the dyspeptic, the bilious, and the constipated, they are alike "a friend in need and a friend indeed."

A Modest, Sensitive Woman

often shrinks from consulting a physician about functional derangement, and prefers to suffer in silence. This may be a mistaken feeling, but it is one which is largely prevalent. To all such women we would say that one of the most skilful physicians of the day, who has had a vast experience in curing diseases peculiar to women, has prepared a remedy which is of inestimable aid to them. We refer to Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. This is the only remedy for women's peculiar weaknesses and ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers that it will give satisfaction in every case or money refunded. See guarantee printed on bottle wrapper.

Being entirely vegetable, they operate without disturbance to the system, diet, or occupation. Put up in glass vials, hermetically sealed. Always fresh and reliable. As a laxative, alterative, or purgative, these little Pellets give the most perfect satisfaction.

SICK HEADACHE,

Bilious Headache, Dizziness, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, and all derangements of the stomach and bowels, are promptly relieved and permanently cured by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. In explanation of the remedial power of these Pellets over so great a variety of diseases, it may truthfully be said that their action upon the system is universal, not a gland or tissue escaping their sanative influence. Sold by druggists, 25 cents a vial. Manufactured at the Chemical Laboratory of WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, Buffalo, N. Y.

$500 REWARD

is offered by the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for a case of Chronic Nasal Catarrh which they cannot cure.

SYMPTOMS OF CATARRH. Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak, watery, and inflamed; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a nasal twang; the breath is offensive; smell and taste are impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, or less understood by physicians.

By its mild, soothing, and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures the worst cases of Catarrh, "cold in the head," Coryza, and Catarrhal Headache.

Sold by druggists everywhere; 50 cents.

"Untold Agony from Catarrh."

Prof. W. HAUSNER, the famous mesmerist, of Ithaca, N. Y., writes: "Some ten years ago I suffered untold agony from chronic nasal catarrh. My family physician gave me up as incurable, and said I must die. My case was such a bad one, that every day, towards sunset, my voice would become so hoarse I could barely speak above a whisper. In the morning my coughing and clearing of my throat would almost strangle me. By the use of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, in three months, I was a well man, and the cure has been permanent."

"Constantly Hawking and Spitting."

THOMAS J. RUSHING, Esq., 202 Pine Street, St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I was a great sufferer from catarrh for three years. At times I could hardly breathe, and was constantly hawking and spitting, and for the last eight months could not breathe through the nostrils. I thought nothing could be done for me. Luckily, I was advised to try Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, and I am now a well man. I believe it to be the only sure remedy for catarrh now manufactured, and one has only to give it a fair trial to experience astounding results and a permanent cure."

Three Bottles Cure Catarrh.

ELI ROBBINS, Runyan P. O., Columbia Co., Pa., says: "My daughter had catarrh when she was five years old, very badly. I saw Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy advertised, and procured a bottle for her, and soon saw that it helped her; a third bottle effected a permanent cure. She is now eighteen years old and sound and hearty."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Markdale has two barbers. It ought soon to have a poorhouse.

Twelve people left Dundalk for Oregon last week, and the Herald says there are more to follow. It is sad to notice a place depopulated at such a rapid rate.

Sixteen visitors registered at the McCullough House, Dundalk, during the recent big storm. The Herald says that none of them drove around to see the public buildings owing to the severity of the weather. Too bad altogether; to think that they should have been in Dundalk for any length of time without seeing the penitentiary, for instance, was really enough to make the hair freeze on the Herald editor's scalp.

THE CREDIT SYSTEM.

The Fighting Editor Rises to make a few Remarks.

I don't like it. I never did. I never will. Too much give and not enough take about it to suit my fancy. It isn't good for the health, much less for the pocket. I once sold a little infant bull-dog to a man on time. The man sold the dog to a gipsy for cash, and then when I asked him to whack up, he told me the pup was no good anyway. The gipsy got the dog, the man got the cash and I got a dollar's worth of experience.

Another time I sold a meek eyed man five dollars worth of material, to be paid for in work. I wanted some wood split and sent for the meek-eyed man to work off five dollars worth of vitality on my wood pile. He was busy—in fact he has been in that predicament ever since. One day I caught him loafing in a shop and delicately hinted that I knew where he could get a job. He said he was sick, and anyway splitting wood always gave him a "creak" in the back. I asked him if he could pile wood if somebody else split it. He said that was worse on him still. I finally asked him if he could sit in my house and watch people piling wood in the yard, to see that there was no "pigeon holing" done. He said inside work always gave him the headache. I then gave him my blessing and hinted that Harry Piper might not be averse to engaging his services as a curiosity. He said he'd see about it and if he got the job he would pay me the $5 in cash!

I presented a little account to a man the other day. He opened it, looked at it, then looked at me, and then told me that he was always glad if he could get his accounts collected inside of a couple of years. I told him he could probably wait that long, but other people, who paid accounts when they were due, were not so "happily" constituted as he was. He then swore some more and insinuated that he would like to be "freed from the law" for about five minutes. I told him it was vulgar to swear, it was not elevating to fight about such a trifle, and that I would see him later.

Some people like the credit system They say it helps business. People buy more than they would if they had the spot cash to pay. True, O eloquent reasoner! and thereby hangs a tale. The credit system tempts people to buy more than the necessaries of life, and in a few years many men—honest men—find themselves unable to make ends meet. A farm or some other bit of real estate must be chucked into the mortgage vendor's shop to straighten things up. On the other hand the business man loses hundred and thousands of dollars in "bad debts." And in order to recover himself, the good paying-customer has to "pay the paper." Otherwise, the business man must put up his shutters and pay a visit to the assignee; or, by lopping off all dead-heads, refusing credit to all but good marks, and by a system of the closest economy, he may find a loophole by which his finances may be recuperated and the difficulty tided over.

But it is hard to get a solid grip on the cash system, so long as there are people who will continue to give credit. I would suggest short dates for settlements. If a man dosn't settle then, close your books to him. Business men are expected to pay their wholesalers in from one to four months, which is practically, though not actually, as good as the cash. Why could not retailers adopt the same system in reference to their customers? Of course doubtful customers are a risky lot. Don't trust them. How long? Not a moment longer than it takes you to wait on them in the store or shop and do up their parcels! Let them plank down the spondulicks or get out right smart. The more profuse they are in in their promises, the greater the risk you run if you trust them.

A closing illustration of the beauties of the credit system will be sufficient at this time: Mr. A. has a note to pay in the bank, in order to meet which he makes up a number of accounts and presents them. Mr. B. cannot pay his little bill because Mr. C. is similarly placed. Somebody dissappoints somebody, who disapoints somebody else, &c. Mr. D. expected to have paid Mr. A. a month ago, but that rascally Mr. E. did not sell his fat steer at the fair (he having asked two prices for the same). Finally Mr. A. is obliged to borrow the amount from some note shaver and pay twenty per cent. interest on the same. But woe unto Mr. A. if he charges Messrs. B. and D. interest on their several accounts. And perhaps he will never get the principal anyway! Its all a lottery.

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Their Diamond Wedding.

By the bed the old man, waiting, sat in vigil sad and tender,
Where his aged wife lay dying, and the twilight shadows brown
Slowly from the wall and window chased the sunset's golden splendor, Going down.

"Is it night?" she whispered, waking (for her spirit seemed to hover Lost between the next world's sunrise and the bedtime cares of this),
And the old man, weak and tearful, trembling as he bent above her,
Answered "Yes."

"Are the children in?" she asked him. Could he tell her? All the treasures
Of their household lay in silence many years beneath the snow;
But her heart was with them living back among her toils and pleasures,
Long ago.

And again she called at dew fall in the sunny summer weather,
"Where is little Charley, father? Frank and Robert—have they come?"
"They are safe," the old man faltered, "all the children are together, Safe at home."

Then he murmured gentle soothings, but his grief grew strong and stronger,
Till it choked and stilled him as he held her wrinkled hand,
For her soul, far out of hearing, could his fondest words no longer Understand.

Still the pale lips stammered questions, lullabies and broken verses,
Nursery prattle, all the language of a mother's loving deeds,
While the midnight round the mourner, left to sorrow's bitter mercies,
Wrapped its weeds.

There was stillness on the pillow—and the old man listened lonely
'Till they led him from the chamber, with the burden on his breast,
For the wife of sixty years, his manhood's early love and only,
Lay at rest.

"Farewell!" he sobbed, "my Sarah, you will meet the babes before me;
'Tis a little while, for neither can the parting long abide,
For you will come and call me soon, I know, and Heaven will restore me
To your side."

It was even so. The spring-time, in steps of winter treading,
Scarcely shed its orchard blossoms ere the old man closed his eyes;
And they buried him by Sarah, and they had their "diamond wedding"
In the skies.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"It is a bitter night, and we are going to have snow, I am sure," Alice Fairholme said, with a shiver. "I am convinced that Oswald would not take you, Shirley, even if Ruby asked him to do so."

"Cannot you imagine a fall of snow heavy enough to block up the lines, Shirley?" asked Ruby, pulling the pretty pink ear near her hand in playful revenge for Shirley's little speech. "No song, no supper—no bride groom, no wedding!"

"My imagination is not so vivid as you give it credit for," Shirley said merrily.

"Is it not?" laughed Alice. "I believe the mere suggestion has made you as white as a ghost, only I cannot see your face. I hope it will not snow," she continued practically. "If it does, it will spoil the whole effect of our wedding finery."

"It will not matter to us," Ruby said merrily. "The snow will make those grenat velvet dresses of ours look delightful, however detrimental it may be to Shirley's satin and lace. And it does not in the least matter how she looks, now that she is provided with a bride groom'"

Shirley laughed, as her thoughts went with a little innocent vanity to the costly dress of satin and lace which had come from Paris on the previous day. It did not matter to her how she looked in any eyes but Guy's, and she felt pretty sure of what he would think of her.

"I wonder you did not choose to be married in a travelling-dress, Shirley. It is getting very much the fashion," Ruby remarked after a pause.

"I should have liked it," Shirley said gently, "but Uncle Gilbert was kind enough to wish me to have a real wedding-dress; and now I am very glad, because I shall like to have it."

"And it will be very useful to you when you join," Ruby remarked. "You can wear it at all the balls the regiment will give for you."

"But Guy has sent in his papers," Shirley said, smiling. "I am not to be an officer's wife at all, Ruby. Sir Jasper wished it so much that Guy was obliged to give in. I am sure he felt it very keenly though, for he was greatly attached to 'ours.'"

"Oh, I did not know! And you—are you glad or sorry, Shirley?" inquired Ruby.

"I think I am sorry," Shirley said. "But of course it does not matter much."

"Of course not," Ruby returned, laughing. "You will be happy anywhere with Guy."

Shirley smiled, and, although her face was in the shadow, a lovely rose-pink colored it from chin to brow for a moment. Ruby bent forward on her chair, and, looking down at her with a little meaning smile, drew her slim white fingers over the hot cheek.

"'Answered,'" she quoted gayly, "'in red letters.' Alice, will you have some more tea."

"Thank you, Ruby. Really it is a shame to trouble you, but I am so delightfully comfortable," answered Miss Fairholme apologetically from her sofa. "Shirley, you are a lazy girl!"

"Shirley is privileged on this last day of her liberty," said Ruby, as she poured out some tea and took it to Alice's side. "We'll let her be happy as long as she can, poor girl. She has not much longer to be so!" she added, as she returned to her seat and again drew Shirley's dainty head to its resting-place, stroking it fondly with her little jewelled hand.

After that there was a short silence in the pretty firelit room. Outside the snow-clouds were gathering dark and heavy and threatening, but within all was bright and warm and cheerful. The household were all busy and bustling; the maids, as they went about their tasks, were wondering what St. Valentine would bring them on the morrow.

In the library Sir Gilbert was at his writing-table, his face grave and softened as he bent over some closely-written sheets of writing-paper which were spread open before him.

In the oak parlor Lady Fairholme and Lady Capel were chatting over their crewel-work; and Oswald Fairholme, coming briskly away from the stables with his hands in his pockets, was humming softly to himself a song which Shirley had sung the night before—

Oh, Ruby, my darling, the small white hand
Which gathered the harebell was never mine own, and Shirley was thinking how slowly the minutes went by while she was waiting for her true love.

And not only the snow-clouds were gathering over Fairholme Court. As fast as steam could bring him, Guy Stuart was coming to claim his bride; and, little more than twelve hours behind him, Sir Hugh Glynn was travelling over the same ground to claim his wife!

"By the bye, Alice," said Ruby, as the gathering dusk filled the pretty room and only the firelight made darkness visible, "shall we have the pleasure of seeing Adonis to-morrow?"

"Adonis, Adonis?" Alice questioned, very languidly. "Whom do you mean, Ruby?"

"Is your memory so exceedingly short?" said Ruby, lifting her pretty dark brows. "Whom should I mean, ma chere, but Sir Hugh Glynn of Maxwell!"

Was it fancy, or did Shirley start under Ruby's hand as she spoke the name?

"No, I am sorry to say not," Alice answered. "Of course, as Guy's friend, he would have been 'best man.' But he went to Cannes to see his mother, who was very ill, and, strangely enough, we have heard nothing of him since."

"Does he know that the marriage takes place to-morrow?" inquired Miss Capel.

"I presume Guy has written to him," said Alice languidly.

"And he has sent you no present, Shirley!" exclaimed Miss Capel. "I should have expected him to give you a diamond bracelet at the least, Shirley, why don't you answer?" she added in a few minutes. "What do you mean by sitting there as silent as a mouse? Do you think Sir Hugh is wearing the willow? Good gracious, child, how you shivered! What's the matter? Are you cold?"

"Cold in this oven!" said a gay voice at the door. "If Shirley is cold here she had better induce Stuart to take her for a wedding trip to Calcutta and back."

"It is not warm in here, Oswald," declared Alice, in her soft languid voice. "I suppose you have been out, so that you feel the sudden change of temperature."

"I did not say it was warm, my dear girl," Oswald Fairholme answered, laughing as he came up to the fire. "It is not warm by any means, but frightfully hot. Miss Capel, how can you endure it?" he added, bending down to have a glimpse of Ruby's pretty blushing face, which she was concealing coquettishly with a great feather fan.

"I don't endure it, I enjoy it," said Ruby demurely, glancing up at him with her sweet dark eyes. "Are you going to the station, Captain Fairholme?"

"Yes. Just imagine the long dark lonely drive," he said ruefully. "Shirley, you ought be deeply obliged to me."

"So I am, Oswald," Shirley answered.

"It is very easy to say so. I say, Miss Capel, don't you call it unparallelled devotion? I had quite made up my mind to marry Shirley myself, and she throws me over in the most unfeeling manner, and actually expects me to go and meet my fortunate rival."

"Poor fellow!" Ruby said, in her pretty soft voice. "He really is to be pitied!"

"There is only one person whose pity I care to have," he answered softly, and then he added in his usual voice, "Any commands for Guy, Shirley? I had better be off."

"Shirley will say what she has to say to Guy herself," Ruby said merrily. "Be off, and, if you are going to drive, mind you don't pitch Major Stuart out under a jealous inspiration."

"A happy thought! I will act upon it," said Oswald, gayly as he left the room.

For some little time longer the girls sat over the fire, Ruby merrily teasing Shirley about her abstraction, and holding with mocking sympathy her little jewelled watch within an inch of the bride-elect's pretty eyes.

But he may be coming yet,
Though he isn't coming now,
For what I thought a swinging gate
Is but a swinging bough, sung Miss Capel gayly as the dressing-bell rang, and the girls started up from their lounging attitudes and prepared to take flight.

"Don't you intend to dress for dinner, Shirley?" asked Alice merrily, as she reached the door and, turning, saw her cousin standing by the fire, a slim graceful figure in black velveteen, with a silver dog-collar clasping her white throat.

"Of course she does," laughed Ruby, following Miss Fairholme. "Leave her alone; she wants a minute to prepare herself for the startling news that the line is blocked at Weldon and that, unless Major Stuart travels by balloon, he can't be here to-morrow."

The girls disappeared, their gay sweet voices and little high heels sounding merrily in the picture-gallery without; but Shirley stood where they had left her, looking into the fire as if she saw a pleasant picture there.

Five minutes passed; then the room door opened softly, and the intruder came forward quietly and noiselessly. There came a gentle touch on Shirley's shoulder, and when she turned round she found herself in the embrace of two strong arms, which folded her so tenderly, yet so closely, that it seemed as if they would never let her go.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A very pleasant party gathered round the dinner-table at Fairholme Court on the evening of Guy's appearance, and the conversation was cheerful and animated. Even Sir Gilbert threw off his natural reserve in his wish that Shirley's last night at Fairholme should be a pleasant one, and Lady Fairholme seconded him admirably. She herself was thoroughly glad that Shirley would so soon cease to be an inmate of the Court. Not that she disliked her—oh, no! but she was so pretty, so dangerously pretty, and her loveliness so threw Alice's delicate blonde prettiness into the shade, that it was quite a relief to Lady Fairholme's maternal anxiety that her husband's niece was going to be taken off her hands.

Shirley, looking bewilderingly lovely in a quaint dress of the very palest, softest shade of blue, was just a trifle silent and grave, but not more so than befitted her position as bride-elect; while Guy Stuart, who looked extremely happy, although his appearance was a little worn and haggard from his attendance on his uncle and his long journey, was radiant, and talked with animation which was unusual to him, now and then bending towards Shirley with some low-spoken words under cover of the general conversation, which brought the color into the fair pale cheeks and made the long lashes droop over the lovely hazel eyes. It would have been difficult to recognize Shirley Ross to-night, on the eve of her wedding-day, as the weary sad-eyed girl who had crouched before the school-room fire on the day on which Sir Hugh Glynn and Major Stuart came over to the Court.

Oswald, from his seat beside Ruby—a place he filled to his own and that young lady's complete satisfaction—glanced occasionally at his cousin, and her face that night—perhaps, because it was the last time he ever saw it bright and smiling—lived long in his memory. Neither Guy nor Shirley was a demonstrative lover, for Major Stuart was the last man in the world to wear his heart on his coat-sleeve, and Shirley was far too delicate-minded to make a parade of a love which seemed to her so sacred and beautiful; but, when Guy's gray eyes went to her face, there was no mistaking the look in them, and even his voice softened when he spoke to her, so that every word seemed like a caress, so tender was its intonation.

It was a pleasant dinner-table, utterly serene and cloudless; and the next day, when the storm-clouds broke with violence, those present looked back at it with longing wishes that the by-gone hours could come again.

The only shadow which fell, and that but lightly, on Shirley's face that night was when she thought of Jack, on his way across the "deep, deep sea" to his new work and his new home; but her sorrow for Jack's absence was almost completely compensated by the thought of the letter he had written to her before he sailed—the loving tender letter wishing her all happiness, and repeating his promise, in earnest heart-felt words which had brought the happy tears to Shirley's eyes, that she should never again have cause to be ashamed of her brother. And Shirley felt that he would keep his word. She was thinking of Jack now tenderly and thankfully, when her attention was caught by a name uttered by Guy's deep rich voice, a name which made Shirley's heart throb fast and furiously.

"By the way, Sir Gilbert," he was saying, "can you tell me anything about Glynn? I wrote to him at Maxwell; but I have received no answer; and I should be extremely sorry if he is not present to-morrow."

"He is abroad with Lady Glynn," answered Sir Gilbert quietly. "He won't be present, Stuart, although of course Lady Fairholme sent him an invitation."

"Lady Glynn has been very ill for some months," Lady Fairholme said, "and she became alarmingly worse early in January; and Sir Hugh, who is a very devoted son, went at once to Cannes, where he has been, we conclude, ever since."

"It is so strange he has not written to me," Major Stuart remarked thoughtfully. "But he never was a good correspondent, and I suppose he does not improve in that respect. Perhaps we may come across him in our travels."

"What an extremely handsome and agreeable man he is!" said Lady Capel, in her languid high-bred voice. "I think there is no doubt that he will not remain longer abroad than is absolutely necessary. He is not a man to neglect such an estate as Maxwell; and there are other attractions, I fancy, in this part of the world."

Miss Fairholme blushed, and her mother, glancing at her, smiled a little, encouraging smile. Shirley, bending over her plate, was white even to the lips. It was strange how Sir Hugh Glynn's name always affected her; but she could not forget his last words to her and the kiss he had left upon her cheek when they had parted. She felt bitterly ashamed and humiliated when she thought of it; but she had decided not to tell Guy yet. Later on, when they were old married people, she would tell him, when Jack should have proved himself truly penitent and fully retrieved his error.

When she looked up again, the conversation had drifted away from Sir Hugh and had wandered to other topics; and presently Lady Fairholme looked at Lady Capel, and the ladies left the dining-room, and went into the great drawing-room, which was brilliantly lighted to display the wedding gifts which had been laid out upon the table, and which were very numerous and costly.

The two elder ladies speedily composed themselves in attitudes of repose on either side of the fire; Shirley sat down in a low chair, a little apart, and folded her hands in her lap, looking very sweet and thoughtful and happy; Alice and Ruby stood by the table, admiring the beautiful parure of diamonds which old Sir Jasper Stuart had sent his embryo niece, and which was a royal gift in the way of beauty and value.

"After all, Madam Shirley," Ruby said gayly, coming to Shirley's chair with a laugh in her sweet dark eyes, "you have not married a poor youth with only his love for a dower. It is all very fine being disinterested in song, but I felt quite sure that you were aware that Major Stuart had a very wealthy uncle, whose favorite nephew he is and whose heir no doubt he will be."

Shirley looked up and smiled, but there was a shadow of pain in her beautiful eyes which Ruby did not see.

"Do you remember how you said you would throw him over for a richer suitor, if you got the chance?" continued Ruby merrily. "You have not forgotten it, Alice, I dare say."

"Don't remind me of that to-night, Ruby," Shirley entreated, with a quick tone of pain in her low voice which Ruby heard.

"Dear forgive me!" she said softly. "I spoke in jest—I did not mean to hurt you. I would not have grieved you for anything. Why, how white you are, Shirley! You must not faint away, or I shall elope with Major Stuart on the instant; and how would you like that? Shirley, dear," added the girl penitently, seeing that her light words had given far more pain than she thought, "forgive me; I am so sorry."

Shirley put her little fingers softly into Ruby's hand and smiled her pardon; and then Miss Capel sauntered away to the piano and began to play softly and sweetly. She was still playing when the gentlemen came in and coffee was served; and Shirley's fair face grew perfectly serene as Guy, after a few words with Ruby at the piano and exchanging a few sentences with Lady Fairholme by the fire, made his way to her side and sat down, with an air of perfect content, in a great arm-chair by her elbow.

"At last!" he said softly, under cover of one of Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words." "I thought I should never get you to myself for half an hour, and I have been positively hungering to hear your voice, Shirley."

"Have you? You have borne up pretty well, all things considered," she returned saucily. "You seemed in excellent spirits all through dinner."

"It was no 'seeming,' pretty one, he declared, smiling. "The good spirits were perfectly genuine, I assure you. Happy, my own? I should think I am happy! There is no happier man in the three kingdoms than I am to-night."

Shirley's sweet eyes, with a bright tender light in their depths, were raised to his, and Guy, meeting them, smiled, and, under cover of her fan, which lay open on her knee, took her little fingers fondly in his.

"And you, my dearest, are you happy?"

"So happy," she answered softly, "that it seems as if my happiness were too great to last."

"Don't say that, love," he said quickly. "Why should it not last? Shirley, it shall be the object of my life to keep you happy."

"An object not difficult to attain, Guy, while I have you."

"Thank you, my own," he said fondly; and there was a brief happy pause. Then he asked her gently whether she had missed him a little during his absence.

"A little!" Shirley repeated softly, with a sudden tremor in his sweet tones. "Oh, Guy, there was not a minute in the day in which I did not miss you and long for you, with such a heart-ache."

"My dearest!" Guy's tender voice said, as he clasped the little clinging fingers in his strong palm.

"Oh, how I wanted you sometimes!" Shirley continued tremulously. "But I was never as lonely as I was before, Guy, because I had your love, and the thought of it made me happy, and so proud!"

"Proud, dear one?" he said, smiling.

"Yes, so proud that you who are so good and generous and noble—no, I will speak, sir—I have not promised to obey yet, you know—that you should have cared for me—such a foolish girl, with nothing to recommend but—"

"But what?" Guy asked softly, smiling at her pretty confusion.

"But my love for you," she whispered.

"My darling," Guy said tenderly, restraining with some difficulty his inclination to take her in his arms and kiss the sweet lips which made such pleasing confessions, "how can I thank you for such pretty words? They are so pleasant, Shirley, and they make me so happy."

"Do they Guy? Do they really make you happy? I like to think that."

"Then you may think so, sweet."

"Guy," she said with sudden earnestness, her face paling with intense feeling as she turned to him, "I think, if anything came between us now, I could not bear it. I should die."

"Thank heaven that nothing can," he returned earnestly; and Shirley experienced such a pleasant feeling of being loved and protected that every shadow fell away, and the perfect peace on Guy's face was reflected on her own.

Meanwhile the rest of the party were amusing themselves as they thought best. Oswald had replaced Ruby at the piano, and was playing the "Wedding-March," with a smile upon his face, and his dark eyes full of fun and tenderness, fixed on Ruby's pretty brunette face, as she stood resting her elbow against the piano, with an expression of amusement and some other feeling fighting for the mastery upon her mobile features. Alice was at the other end of the room, playing bezique with one of Oswald's friends, who had already fallen desperately in love with her and who, although not such a desirable parti as Sir Hugh Glynn, was by no means a "detrimental."

Sir Gilbert, from his arm-chair, was glancing occasionally at his niece, and seemed in doubt or hesitation as he did so, for his face wore a slightly troubled look, and there was a very unusual expression of indecision in his blue eyes. He did not like the idea of clouding the happiness on Shirley's face, but in his breast-pocket lay the letter which his sister had been anxious about during her last hours—the letter she had intrusted to Shirley for her uncle, and which contained, written by herself for her daughter's perusal, the story of her life.

Suddenly the loud triumphant notes of Oswald's music ceased, and his fingers wandered into a soft quaint melody, and, after a minute's prelude, his rich tenor voice rose softly and clearly, singing these words—

Linger, O gentle time!
Linger, O radiant grace of bright to-day!
Let not the hour's chime
Call thee away,
But linger near me still with fond delay.

Linger—for thou art mine.
What dearer treasures can the Future hold?
What sweeter flow'rs than thine
Can she unfold—
What secrets tell my heart thou hast not told?

Linger: I ask no more;
Thou art enough forever—thou alone.
What future can restore,
When thou art flown,
All that I hold from thee and call my own?

"That is a dreary little song," Guy said softly. "That future will not take away our joys, my darling, and it may hold 'dearer treasures' for us."

"It would be difficult for it to do that, dear," Shirley softly returned. "Oh, Guy, I can imagine no happiness greater than ours now!"

"I can," said Major Stuart. "I can imagine you and I alone together, sweet; and that seems a much pleasanter state of things to me even than the present. Do you think you will regret your liberty, Shirley?"

"I do not think that I have had much liberty to boast of since I came to Scotland," she answered, smiling; "and before that—Oh, Guy," she added, breaking off suddenly, "it makes me happier now to think that my dear mother saw you, and that almost her last words to me were a message of thanks to you for your kindness to her!"

"I am glad of that," he said gently. "I think, if she knows how deeply I love you, my dearest, she will be glad that you are to be mine. What, is it bedtime already?"

"It is getting late," answered Lady Fairholme, smiling, "and I can't have pale checks to-morrow; so, as we have no rouge in the house, I am going to send all these young people to bed."

"Good-night, my own, until to-morrow," Guy said, with a long close pressure of the little hand and a long last look at the lovely face—a last look indeed, for he never saw it again as it was then. And Shirley said nothing, but only lifted her eyes to his, and then turned away.

As she said good-night to her uncle, he gave her the letter which he took from his pocket.

"I am obeying your mother's wish in giving you this, Shirley," he said gently. "I should have kept its contents a secret from you still, but she wished it."

"Thank you, Uncle Gilbert," the girl answered, a little surprised; "and thank you with all my heart for all your goodness to me," she added, so earnestly that the tears rose in the beautiful eyes; and Sir Gilbert kissed her kindly on the forehead, and bade Heaven bless her in a tone of gentleness very unusual to him.

"Now, girls, don't get chatting and sitting up late," Lady Fairholme said, smiling as she took her bedroom candlestick and went her way; and the girls laughed and promised, but went nevertheless into Shirley's room to see the wedding-dress, which had been unpacked, and which lay in all its bridal finery upon the couch in her room.

When they had admired it to their heart's content, and stroked with gentle white fingers the glossy satin and filmy lace, Alice and Ruby went away leaving Shirley in solitude at last.

There was a bright fire burning in the grate, and Shirley stood looking at it with dreamy thoughtful eyes for a few moments; then she turned away and began hastily to undress. As she removed the pretty blue dress, the letter which her uncle had given her fell from its folds, and she stooped quickly and lifted it, feeling guilty and remorseful because of the little thought she had given her mother's communication—her dear dead mother!

She threw the blue dress carelessly aside and hastily slipped on a dressing-gown; then, seating herself before the fire, she took out the letter. For a few minutes she examined it gently, touching it with tender reverent fingers and looking at it with eyes into which great tears rose as she gazed. She knew the handwriting well, the pretty graceful handwriting which had been so familiar to her. How clearly it brought her mother back to her now—the dear gentle mother who had never given her a cross word, who had always sympathized so perfectly with her joy and with her girlish sorrows! Ah, how joyful she would have been to-night to think that her little daughter was so happy! How pleased she would have felt! How proud and fond of Guy she would have been, and what a devoted son he would have been to her! Ah, darling mother!

Looking at the letter, with its tender superscription, "To my dear little daughter," brought back clearly that last sad journey and the anxiety she had shown to tell Shirley something. What was it? Ah, she would know now! These broken piteous sentences would soon be explained. Tenderly, with fingers which were a little unsteady in their eagerness, Shirley broke the seal of the letter, and, drawing the lamp nearer to her, spread out the closely-written sheets.

The Corset and the Bustle.

The corset threatens to follow the bustle uto oblivion. Many ladies are abandoning it. In order to do this all such things as waist bands of skirts must go also, as part of the business of the corset is to prevent said bands from cutting into the body. In order to dispense with bands frocks must be made on a princesse foundation, so that their weight is hung upon the shoulders and not the hips. Many ladies have already adopted that style of dress, but nobody would suspect them, as they drape and trim to look quite like the back-breaking, mind-weakening prevailing mode. —Dress Reformer.

Some fussy-minded male has taken the trouble to compile statistics of the sizes of New York ladies' corsets, with the result that he has discovered the average dimensions of stays around the waist to be twenty-three inches, or just four inches smaller than the natural waist of the average woman is supposed to be. Upon this fact he comments with great seriousness, and even goes the length of attributing to this compression a thousand deaths per annum.—Albany (N. Y.) Journal.

The Ideal Newspaper.

Making of newspapers is a business, and why should not newspaper men be allowed to manage their occupation in a business way? They cater to public tastes; they bid for public patronage, and to do this they must furnish what the public wants. If the public does not want an ideal newspaper, so much the worse for the public. The same public that rejects the ideal boat and the ideal bonnet has time and again spurned the ideal paper from it and would have none of it. Stock in an ideal newspaper usually is worth all the way from 15 cents to a dollar downward.

The Servant of the Future.

Madam—Can you cook chloral croquettes?

Cook—Yes, madam.

Madam—Can you make a hasheesh omelette?

Cook—Yes, madame.

Madame—Do you speak Volapuk?

Cook—Fluently.

Madam—Well, I think you will do.

"What made you hesitate and stumble so?" asked the bride who had abandoned widowhood to become the wife of a young travelling man. "I couldn't help it," he pleaded, "I've never had any practical experience." And there was a family quarrel right there and then.

The Sleepers: A Contrast.

Behold them slumbering side by side,
Fair smiling youth and hoary age;
One dreams of worldly pomp and pride,
Where men a godless warfare wage;
The other dreams of summer bowers,
Bright sunshine, warbling birds and flowers.

One brow is marked with lines of care,
Which shows the world-worn spirit grieves;
The other gleams 'neath clustering hair
Like a fair star through quivering leaves.
One heart is grasping, proud and cold;
The other generous, warm and bold.

One breathes a long, a weary sigh,
And dreams of earthly gain and loss,
As with a keen, suspicious eye,
He counts once more his glittering dross.
The other bounds with joyous tread
O'er fields of clover white and red.

A groan escapes the old man's lips,
A groan of mingled rage and pain,
For, lo! his schemes, like phantom ships,
Have vanished 'neath the treacherous main.
He stretches forth one wrinkled hand
To find his treasured hoard but sand.

From parted lips of tender bloom
A trill of merry laughter steals,
Whose fairy music fills the room—
The happy boy in dreamland kneels
Above a little crystal stream,
Where rushes wave and pebbles gleam;

And he beholds with sparkling eyes
His ship—a water lily—glide
Beneath the rosy-tinted skies,
Right bravely down the dimpling tide.
His barque no sordid hopes doth bear,
But dances on, he cares not where.

Hark! now the dreaming worldling speaks:
"The path to wealth, how drear, how long!"
"Ah!" cries the boy, with glowing cheeks,
"How lovely is the skylark's song,
High-soaring 'mid the blue above,
Forever singing: 'God is love!'"

And when the morning sun shall rise
To charm away the mists of night,
The boy will greet with gladdened eyes
A world of beauty bathed in light,
For a fond mother's morning kiss
Will ope its golden gates of bliss.

But the poor worldling, what of him?
Will he not seek the busy mart,
Like some gaunt spectre, stern and grim,
No joy within his withered heart?
For life is empty, vain and cold
To him who only seeketh gold!

Your Wife's Letters.

Charles Dudley Warner, in replying to the question: "Can a man open a wife's letters?" said that it would depend upon what kind of a husband he is. I think it would be nearer right to say it would depend upon what kind of a wife she is. "Discretion is the better part of valor," as many a husband would learn if he made so bold as to open his wife's letters. There is scarcely a wife who does not take her husband sufficiently into her confidence to tell him who her letters are from and to read them to him, or, perhaps, let him read them himself; but this is a very different matter from having them first opened, read and passed upon by one for whom they were not intended. Of course many women receive letters that never reach the eyes of their life partners, not because they contain aught that would not bear the light of day, not because the wife is afraid or ashamed to show them, but simply because they contain things that are none of his affair. How often the home letters are written only for daughters' or sisters' eyes! How much of the family cares can be told her that would be proudly withheld from son-in-law or brother-in-law! Then there are the letters from dear, intimate girl friends, who pour out the secrets of their heart upon paper for the sympathy and entertainment of sweet Mrs. Jones, but not for the eyes of sarcastic Mr. Jones. A very laughable but sensible reason for a wife withholding her letters from her husband was given by a contemporary not long since. She said: "These letters contain the confessions of another soul, the confidences of another mind, that would be rudely treated if given any sort of publicity. And while husband and wife are one to each other, they are two in the eyes of other people, and it may well happen that a friend will desire to impart something to a discreet woman which she would not intrust to the babbling husband of that woman." That's the whole thing in a nutshell.—Philadelphia North American.

Personal Points.

Mr. A. A. Allworth, late editor of the Paris Review, has, it is said, given up the newspaper business in Oregon, and gone into agricultural pursuits.

Gen. Lew Wallace, the author of "Ben Hur," is said to be distressingly absent-minded. He has been known when at breakfast to put two heaping spoonfuls of sugar on a soft-boiled egg and then, almost before the laughter had died away, to salt his coffee with great deliberation.

The Welland Telegraph says: We are pleased to state that Capt. W. T. Sawle, proprietor of the Telegraph, is decidedly improved in health. He has been confined to bed for the past week or ten days, but expects to be up again shortly now.

A New Use of Electricity.

The science of electricity has already been passed into the service of fashion. When, at a dance or a dinner party, a glittering dew-drop seems suddenly to sparkle among the flowers on a lady's shoulder, or a diamond-light flare draws attention to her pretty coifure, the admiring observer may take it for granted the possessor of the dew-drops and the starry light in her hair is secretly pressing a tiny battery, ingeniously concealed about her person, and by means of which the electric spark flies up, to the danger perhaps of the beholder, if not the possessor.—Pall Mall Gazette.

PAPPOOSE HUNGRY.

An Incident of the Early Days.

It was on a solemn quiet afternoon at the close of the year 1814 that John —— broke off from his carousal at a small tavern at the old outlet of Ma-cas-sa Water. Although a very harmless man ordinarily, he was nevertheless subject to fits of petulant despondency which could only be relieved by imbibing large quantities of the pale Canadian rye whiskey for several days in succession. This usually brought his head to a dead level and he became a philosopher again—until the return of his irresistible thirst for stimulants. He was the son of a U. E. Loyalist and had served in the Canadian Flankers during the recent war with the United States. He was well posted in Indian characteristics, having a profound respect for the half civilized Massissaugas, but, for the wild Northwest Indians, whom the Government had brought to the front as auxiliaries, he, in common with all the old Canadians, held in supreme contempt. These Indians were wonderfully reliable when it came to drawing supplies, but when an engagement with the enemy was imminent, notably at Lundy's Lane, Lo could not be brought within gunshot; but as soon as Lo discovered that the Glengarrys were driving back the enemy, he put in an appearance, and was very busy during the balance of the night (the engagement was fought by cloudy moonlight) and the following morning plundering indiscriminately both friend and foe, the dead and the helpless wounded. In consequence of which brutality several Indians were shot on the field by the Flankers. If the reader can pardon the above digression, which I consider somewhat apropos as giving the cause in part of the old Canadian's hatred of the wild Indian, we will return to John, whose house stood on the present Harris farm on the north of the Bay road. Thither my informant's mother and a neighbor who lived near (now) the Hamilton Waterworks had gone on a short visit to John's wife during his absence. While there a stalwart Northwest Indian came to the house, and after satisfying himself that there was not a man about to oppose him, he went to the pig pen, in which there was a shote in fair condition. The three women understood from past experience that "Lo, the poor Indian," intended to carry away the pig. They expostulated with him as best they could, but Lo simply replied: "Pappoose; pappoose hungry!" Seeing the coast clear, he shot the pig, and, tieing its legs together in such a way that by placing the strap across his breast the pig rested on his back, then turning to the women, he grunted "Ugh!"—which always seems to mean "Well, what of it?"—he marched away towards the bay. The Indian had not gone far when John hove in sight, his locomotion having been somewhat hastened by his hearing the report of an Indian gun near his house—which could be easily known, as the Indian gun barrels were thin and light and their report feeble as compared with heavier barrels or the sharp crack of the old eight-square rifle barrels of the white man—consequently, John suspected mischief. John's wife ran out to meet him and tell him of their loss, and no doubt, Eve-like, told him "to shoot the tarned Injuin." John made no reply, but hitching up his waistbands on his long, lanky sides, and thrusting a big quid of tobacco into his left cheek and bracing himself up generally as was becoming the occasion, he stepped into the house, and taking down his trusty rifle from the wood hooks against a beam and coolly examining the priming of the old flint lock, he struck out in the direction the Indian had taken, diverging however a little to the left in order to head him off. He soon reached the bank of the second inlet, about where instinct told him the Indian would cross. He had not long to wait. Poor Lo came up within easy range, and halted on the brink either to rest or to consider the strength of the ice. John took a deliberate aim at him, but, Lo being all unconscious of any danger, John's heart relented and he hesitated a moment, then levelling his rifle a second time, he said to himself, "I'll pull, may the Lord direct the ball." Lo instantly fell. The blue smoke from the rifle curled upward among the tree tops like an innocent messenger carrying the sad tidings to the regions above. John mechanically reloaded his rifle and strode slowly forward to catch a sight of Lo. Every bush seemed to glare at him with the eyes of demons, and a cold shudder came over him. There lay his victim linked in death with his booty. No hungry pappoose was ever to see him again. The bullet had torn through the base of the brain, and the blood trickled slowly over the coarse dark face. He was stone dead. Here was a dilemma into which John had hastily fallen. Should any of Lo's comrades come suddenly upon the scene John would as surely get his furlough, soon or late, for the white man's future world, as he had given Lo his for the happy hunting ground. No time was to be lost. Only a moment's consideration and John broke a hole in the ice with the breech of his rifle, large enough to admit Lo's body, and separating it from the pig's, threw it in. Then searching about he found a convenient pole, with which he succeeded in thrusting the body so far down into the mud and weeds that it was never seen again. What became of the pig my informant saith not. Dread winter passed away, cheery spring came and early summer. John had occasion to fortify his system against the encroachments of approaching hot weather, and accordingly resorted to the little tavern at the inlet, where he indulged more freely than ever for two or three days, or until his stomach revolting he could drink no longer, and he set out in the evening homeward bound. He had got as far as where John Dynes' hotel is at present—the weather being dull and murky, and withal rather hot—and the road becoming tedious he cast his eyes about for help in getting home and espied a dim light on the marsh shore, and being just a little bewildered he supposed it to be a fishing light and that he could get himself paddled over to the main land. Approaching the light he was sair astonished to find that it moved away from him, and crossed the marsh, just skimming the water, and halted on the mainland, on the bank of the inlet, over the exact spot where he had shot the Indian. Here it hovered a moment and then disappeared. John never having heard of the ignes fatui supposed this to be intended as a reminder to him of his crime, and also as a mark of the Divine displeasure. Melancholy fastened on him for the rest of his days, and he always became densely gloomy when the Indian and the pig were spoken of by his neighbors.

"Shoot Him" Sentences.

Lord Charles Beresford's marvellous ability to dismiss thought from his mind was very aptly illustrated the other day by a navy man who had been with Lord Charles in Egypt. He was in a railway carriage with me and was giving another man opposite the benefit of his Beresfordian impressions.

"I tell you Charlie Beresford's a tough' un. It don't take him long to settle a point. When he was in command of the police at Alexandria every morning a lot of poor devils whom the police had arrested used to be brought before him. He'd come out smoking a cigarette, with a bright, cheery face and a devil-may-care look. A wretched, half-starved, half-naked native would be dragged up.

"'What has he been doing?' asks Lord Charlie.

"'Looting the shops.'

"'Shoot him.'

"The poor chap begins whining, and crying, and pleading.

"'Next!' Lord Charles calls, and away goes the man.

"Another native is hauled up by the collar, struggling and howling.

"'What?'

"'Resisting police.'

"'Shoot him.'

"And so on until a dozen or twenty fates are sealed by this young judge, from whose decision lies no appeal. His cigarette finished, he goes into breakfast, his appetite quite undisturbed by the volleys which presently greet his ears. I tell you, he's the chap for business. There's no humming and hawing about him."—The Argonaut.

Hints to Housewives.

Clean piano keys with a soft rag dipped in alcohol.

Egg stains on silver can be taken off with table salt and a wet rag.

Leather chair seats may be revived by rubbing them with well-beaten white of egg.

White and pale shades of paint may be beautifully cleaned by using whiting in the water.

Cold sliced potatoes fry and taste better by sprinkling a teaspoonful of flour over them while frying.

To polish nickle-plated goods after becoming black and not worn, use rouge or whiting on a rag with a little oil.

A good rule for the use of the different kinds of flour is to use pastry flour wherever baking powder is used, and bread flour with yeast.

When a person is "sick at the stomach," ice taken into the mouth in small pieces and allowed to melt before swallowing will, in very many instances, relieve the discomfort.

To cure a wart, place the thumb upon the wart and press it against the bone. Move the wart backward and forward upon the bone until the roots become irritated or sore, when the wart will disappear.

A pie that is properly baked will slip from the tin with careful handling, and if placed on a wire frame where the air has access to the bottom it will cool without becoming moist, and when ready to be served it can be transferred to a plate.

Scotch Musicians in London.

Another London correspondent writes: "The Scotch colony here, and especially that by no means unimportant section of it which is fond of music, has been rejoicing greatly over the election of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, the Edinburgh musician and composer, to the Presidency of the Royal Academy of Music. Mr. Mackenzie's abilities have been very fully recognized here for some time back; but he had a most formidable rival in Mr. Joseph Barnby, who is admitted to be one of the best conductors now in London. Mr. Mackenzie received a great ovation when, for the first time since he went to Florence, he appeared to conduct an orchestral concert on the evening after his election. While Mr. Mackenzie is the first composer—in the serious sense—in London, the best writer of comic opera music is Mr. Henry Brougham Farnie. Mr. Farnie is a Scotchman and a newspaper man, I believe, having been engaged on either a Stirling or a Perth paper."

Probable Origin of "Blizzard."

The origin of the word "blizzard" has been taxing the etymologists quite severely of late, and various are the hypotheses advanced. Yesterday afternoon a Dakota man, who is naturally familiar with the article, if not with its derivation, blew into the Globe office and settled it. He produced a copy of the Lyon County News, at Moorhead, which credits Deacon Seth Knowles, of that town, with the coinage of the word. He used the sentence, "It is blowing like a blitzardt," which would convey the idea that the wind travelled like lightning (blitzen). A German would say: "Der sturm kommit blitzartig." From "blitzardt" to "blizzard" is a very slight transition. This language was used to describe the great storm of January, 1873. And this settles it.—St. Paul Globe.

An Unselfish Man.

Somebody wants our definition of "a truly unselfish man." Well, to boil it down, we should say that a man who would rather chop wood after business hours for the benefit of the hired girl than see a tax collector struck by lightning is a truly unselfish man.—Burlington Free Press.

Brave Women.

There are lots of latent pluck in a woman after all. Dozens of delicate members of the fair sex faced the blast and snow, pluckily climbed drifts ten feet high, reached their place of business, worked during the day and then footed it home again. And they didn't, as a rule, seek liquid inspiration behind green baize doors, either.—Brooklyn Times.

A correspondent mixes metaphors a little when he writes of politicians: "They stand at the Government crib, with an axe to grind."—New York Tribune.

"Oh, girls, come and see the walking match!" And when they got to the window all they saw was a sliver of a dude with a red head.

The Vancouver, from Liverpool, with the weekly mails and 48 cabin, 92 intermediate and 225 steerage passengers, arrived at Halifax at 4 o'clock on Saturday morning.

CONTRIBUTING TO CHURCHES.

Payments From Accumulated Wealth and From Daily Earnings.

Dr. J. D. Macdonald, of Hamilton, writing to the Canada Presbyterian on the subject of supporting Church enterprises, submits a couple of ideas that are worthy of the earnest consideration of ministers and church officials of all denominations. He says:

For my own part I do not think that the people of the Church are less disposed to be just to its enterprises than they were of old times, but while the work of the Church has been suddenly expanded, the resources of the people have been rapidly contracted; and I am persuaded that they do not contribute just because the means so to do are not at hand. It must be admitted that the mass of our people does not consist of those who are possessed of realized wealth, but that the Church treasury has been every year filled from the fruits of the industry of the contributors during the year preceding. As soon as this industry ceases to be profitable the resources of the Church must be cut off. Will any one venture to say that industry has been profitable in Canada for the last ten years? Perhaps we may except the industry of the "rings," but that is hardly a legitimate industry, and is not much, if of any, use to us. Then it is perfectly right that we should look at another source of impoverishment for the classes of which the Presbyterian Church is mainly formed, the classes who occupy a middle place as to wealth. The day was when very many of the most wealthy men in the Province were Presbyterians; and perhaps we have hardly yet got over the habit of expecting the large sums which used to be given by the rich and generous few, and which once filled the treasury of the Church. But the fathers have fallen asleep, and the sons do not often walk in the fathers' steps. The Presbyterian Church is not so much as it should be the Church of the poor. It is not either the Church of the rich, at least in Canada, nor need it desire to be, but it is the Church of the class which feels most heavily the burden of public taxation. The cry is universal that it is hard to live; and why is it hard to live? The necessaries of life are produced more cheaply and more plentifully than ever, but our system of taxation adds so enormously to their cost that it is difficult for the man of moderate means to obtain them. He is stinted, and he is not in the condition or temper to stint himself and his family any more for the sake of the growing claims of the Church. Nor is he at all in the mood to be smoothed down by those writers in the religious press, who tell him that, in their opinion, he is mean or sordid. It looks as if the Church must set itself to a reconsideration of its mode of finance suiting itself to changed conditions. More especially will it be needful to give attention to the sources of supply, to have better acquaintance with details as respects those sources, and to establish an organization for the management of those details. If we may not expect large donations in our hour of need, let us exercise foresight and care with our smaller offerings. Those more numerous contributions will not only fill the treasury, but will be a means of increasing the interest of the givers in the work to be done. And let the Church decline to be led by those ardent brethren who are so often ready with new schemes, but do not trouble their minds much, if at all, with the question of the providing of means.

Sure to Be Hit Somewhere.

At a recent gathering of Unitarians, one speaker recited an anecdote which admits of large and varied application. It was the story of a minister who, preaching on exchange, said some strong things about fast horses. He was told after the sermon that he had touched one of their best members on a tender point. "Well," said the preacher, "I cannot change my sermon for him." In the evening the man was introduced to the minister, who said: "I understand that what I said this morning touched one of your weaknesses. I assure you that I was altogether unconscious of the weakness when I said it." "Oh, do not trouble yourself," said the man. "It is a very poor sermon that does not hit me somewhere."—Christian Intelligencer.

Cause and Effect.

Romantic Miss—Oh, dear! it just makes me mad the way things go.

Sympathizing Friend—Why, what's the matter now?

"There I've been playing the piano for five mortal hours, straining my hands all out of shape trying to make it sound loud enough to attract the attention of that handsome young stranger who was writing by the window in the next house, and he only looked over this way three times, and now he isn't in sight at all."

"No. As I came in I saw him leaving the house with two big satchels."

"You did? Oh, dear! That woman who has that house never can keep a lodger."

Metaphors a Little Mixed

A speaker at a financial conference in England is reported by the London Spectator as alluding to a certain sum as "a nest egg for us to take our stand upon." Another described a projected economy as "a mere flea bite in the ocean of Indian debt." An Irish medical man outdid the famous exordium of the western legislator, beginning, "Mr. Speaker, I smell a rat," etc. Some change was contemplated, of which he expressed the most vehement disapproval, declaring that it would throw "an apple of discord in their midst which, if not nipped in the bud, would burst out into a flame that would inundate the whole country."

And Only One.

Utah is knocking loudly for admission into the union. Nothing should avail except a ticket inscribed as were Artemus Ward's free passes to his lecture on the Mormons, "Admit bearer and one wife."—Texas Siftings.

A Montana paper recently contained this remarkable notice: "Mr. Charles Johnson and Miss Fanny West were married by the Rev. S. Hills on Wednesday. So far no trouble has resulted, and those best informed as to the situation say there will be none." The next day the editor apologised and explained that part of an item regarding an incipient strike had got into the wrong place.

LOST IN THE QUICKSANDS

The Terrible Fate of a Young Hunter on the San Leandro, Cal., Marshes.

The dog that accompanied James Richardson on his hunting trip has been found, and there is now little doubt as to what has become of the boy. Near Melrose station, on the San Leandro marshes, is a very dangerous place, where quicksands are known to exist. On Wednesday morning following the disappearance of young Richardson, Mr. Damon, who lives on the San Leandro marshes, heard the long-drawn howl of a dog on the marsh. For a while Mr. Damon thought nothing whatever about the matter, until the howling was kept up at intervals, when he went out to investigate. Following up the sound, he found a valuable bird dog lying on the edge of a dangerous bit of marsh land, where several quicksands are known to be. The dog was watching the marsh and howling. He was nearly dead from cold and lack of food. Mr. Damon took him home, thinking that he was a lost dog of a hunter, and the next day he was sent to San Francisco, where yesterday he was recognized as the dog that accompanied Richardson on his last hunting expedition. There is little hope that the boy is alive. The father of the boy is nearly crazed with grief, and he spends his time searching the marshes for some trace of his son. The doctor who has been attending Mr. Richardson for the past few years has ordered that he shall not go down on the marshes again or he will not be responsible for the result. He met him recently going on his old fruitless search and compelled him by main strength to enter his buggy and drive home with him. Since the return of the dog all hope has been abandoned, and it is believed that the faithful animal saw the boy sink in the quicksand and gave the only alarm he could without leaving his post. It is supposed that James stayed out later than he intended to, and in returning in the dusk he fell into the quicksand and was unable to extricate himself.—Oakland, Cal., Tribune.

Writing Prescriptions in English.

Those who talk glibly about "plain English" may be surprised to learn that there is no such thing as plain English when we come to deal with materia medica. The "plain English" for some important herb will be one thing in Massachusetts, something else in Pennsylvania and something different from either in England. To increase the confusion the name given to a certain plant in one section may be applied to something altogether different in another. Thousands of valetudinarians cross the Atlantic yearly, carrying prescriptions on which their health depends. Careful pharmacists in all countries compound them alike, because prescription Latin is precise, unequivocal and uniform. The word salt may seem plain enough to cooks, but to the chemist it is vague and meaningless. Put on paper, however, the official Latin name of table salt and you can present that to a druggist in Paris, Rome, Madrid or Berlin with the certainty of getting precisely what would be put up by a druggist in Biddeford, Me. Fatal errors by pharmacists are rare when compared with the number of important prescriptions compounded daily. Taken as a class, I believe druggists to be more careful and painstaking than any other branch of tradesmen. But, if we want to see 2,000 mistakes where there are twenty now, let us have prescriptions in this so-leged "plain English."—Letter in Boston Globe.

Voting in Switzerland

After divine service on election Sunday I went to the Croix Blanche for my coffee to pass the time till the voting should begin. On the church door was posted a printed summons to electors, and on the cafe billiard tables I found ballots of the different parties scattered. Gendarmes had also distributed them about in the church pews; they were enclosed in envelopes, which were voted sealed. On a table before the pulpit the ballot-box—a glass urn—was placed, and beside it sat the judges of election with lists of the registered voters. But in any precinct of the canton an elector who could prove that he had not voted at home might deposit his ballot in any other. The church bell rang for the people to assemble, and the voting began and ended in perfect quiet. But I could not witness an election in this ancient republic, where freedom was so many centuries old, without strong emotion; it had from its nature and the place the consecration of a religious rite.—Harper's Bazar.

A Preacher Holds the Fort.

Rev. J. G. Owens, pastor of a church at Cornwall, Wales, was given by his congregation a three months' notice to quit. The time expired one Saturday evening, but the pastor barricaded himself in his pulpit and held the fort all that night and most of the following day. For two hours on Sunday he preached to his congregation while they drowned his words by hymns sung at the top of their voices. At last the preacher marched out of the church with the honors of war, under the protection of the police.

Three-year-old Cyclone—Yes, sir.

Papa—Be careful now. I'll ask mamma, if she says you didn't ask her I'll whip you for telling a story. Did you ask mamma?

Cyclone—Truly papa, I asked her. (A pause.) She said I couldn't have it.

Fearing that some woman may sail in upon us and give us a cowhiding, we will explain: The winking and blinking of our right eye goes on oftentimes when we are not aware of it, caused by a recent spell—and a long one, too—of neuralgia in that member.—Bronwood (Ga.) Reporter.

Coal oil is retailing here at 10 cents a gallon!

We are glad to see that Mr. Merchant, Head Master of the O.S. Collegiate Institute, has recovered from his recent illness.

Creighton Bros. Railroad House, the oldest dry goods establishment in O.S., will hereafter flourish under the management of Mr. Geo. P. Creighton—his brother, Mr. W. J. Creighton, retiring.

The Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union of O.S. will give something unusual entitled "Songs and Scenes of other Days," in the Town Hall, April 10th.

Mar. 23.—The annual entertainment of the O.S. Northern Business College was held this evening in the Town Hall. The tableaux were a failure, owing to insufficient light. The concluding farce was the best thing on the programme, being highly amusing to all.

Mar. 25.—The Rev. Yoshiyusa Hiraiwa, a native Japanese minister, occupied the pulpit of the O. S. Methodist church, morning and evening. In the afternoon he addressed the Sunday school children and many adults; also, in his Japanese costume which is made entirely of silk; the skirt was dark blue silk, in long plaits and the upper portion of the garment was of black silk, fashioned in the shape of a loose gown with flowing sleeves. In the evening he appeared also in costume before a congregation of some fifteen hundred people, many being obliged to stand. He showed a small metallic idol which his countrymen worship, and told many interesting things concerning the customs of the Japanese. In regard to women he said that they were kept under to a great extent, and allowed but few priviledges with their husbands. If a woman talked too much, that was sufficient grounds for a divorce. If husband and wife were asked out to tea, they did not go together—the husband went first and the wife brought up the rear! From the click of silver and the rustle of bills, we suppose the collections were something handsome.

Maxwell.

From our own Correspondent.

As times are a little dull at this time of the year of course news items sometimes naturally get scarce. But after the long cold winter we are anxiously waiting for the warm spring weather which we think cannot be delayed much longer.

Mrs. Wm. Morrison, one of the early settlers of this neighborhood, died on Saturday night at the age of 63 years. Her death was not altogether unexpected as she has been very feeble for some time past. Her remains were interred on Tuesday in St. Mary's church cemetery. Mr. Morrison has the sympathy of the entire community in his bereavement.

Severe colds have affect the entire neighborhood. For some time in some cases whole families have been laid up at one time and nearly every one sets it down as being the worst cold they ever had.

Rev. L. Hall, of Feversham, preached a very interesting sermon in the Methodist church here on Sunday last.

Mr. Richard Maxwell is moving this week to his new home on R. Kinner's farm.

Mr. R. Spafford, of Port Arthur, paid a visit to his old friends here last week. We were pleased to see him looking so well and glad to hear of his prosperity in the far North-West.

Our merchants look with much suspicion on a pile of lumber drawn to the village. Thinking some rich man intends building an opposition store.

Baby Bunting Again.

One of the greatest literary hits of the season is the story of "Baby Bunting; or, the Alphabet of Love," by Laura Jean Libbey, which is at present being published in the columns of The New York Family Story Paper. The paper containing the opening chapters of this wonderfully popular romance appeared on the news stands this morning. The tremendous rush for that number by the young ladies of the town shows clearly the publishers have struck a bonanza. The Family Story Paper is for sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address four months, postage free, for $1. Spring has fully opened in Miss Maud Richardson's Millinery Show Rooms and orders are coming in fast. Ladies be in time, full stock to select from now.

The annual meeting of the Plotholders of Flesherton Cemetery Trust will be held in the Town Hall, on Wednesday evening next, 11th inst. WM. CLAYTON, Secretary.

Misses Lizzie and Annie Richardson, who have been attending the Collegiate Institute at Owen Sound for some time, are spending the Easter holidays at home.

Mr. J. W. Bates has secured a lucrative position as travelling salesman with Ont. Casket Co., Ridgetown, and 48 & 50 Wellington street East, Toronto, wholesale manufacturers of funeral furnishings. Mr. Bates will remove with his family to Toronto next week. We wish friend B. every success.

In the department of militia and defence's report for last year, we observe that the excellent management and condition of the armories of Flesherton and Clarksburg Volunteer Companies are particularly mentioned. Lieut. Field, who has charge of the former, is a model officer and takes pride in having everything connected with our armory in "apple pie order."

Now, young man, don't wait for your spring suit until the tailors have three weeks work ahead. Be in time, and first go and see Richardson & Co's immense range of New Spring Suitings.

The revival services, which have been going on in the Methodist church here for several weeks—were brought to a close on Friday evening last. The earnest and stirring appeals of Rev. Mr. Shilton have had the effect of producing a laudable spirit of emulation among the members themselves, as well as of leading others to turn their thoughts seriously to that higher and nobler sphere of existence.

Energy will do almost anything, but it cannot exist if the blood is impure and moves sluggishly in the veins. There is nothing so good for cleansing the blood and imparting energy to the system as Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Price $1. Six bottles, $5. Sold by druggists.

Miss Vina Symington, of Stratford, is the guest of Mrs. Climo, Flesherton.

Mr. J. B. Sloan, of Eugenia, always has a good stock of Shingles for sale. He also chops grain. See advt.

Say, Mister, you want a new hat for next Sunday. You can't wear that cap in the spring sunshine. Go and see Richardson & Co's big stock of New Spring Hats—sure to suit you.

Hurrah for Osprey!

An Osprey subscriber sends the following item:—"John and Wm. Ottewell of this township cut twelve and a half cords of stove wood in ten hours, with a Diamond saw, in Thos. Cooper's bush. Cooper says he has money to put up that they can do it again. Beat that who can.

Giving Credit Where Credit was Not Due.

In last week's Markdale Standard appeared a long and flowery presentation address to one Thos. Sanderson of Holland township dated. A night or two after that pathetic and soul-stirring event this very same Sanderson silently and suddenly "folded his tent," and took a moon-light flit—family, bags and baggage. He went to Durham and took the morning train there en route for Michigan, U.S. He omitted paying his debts before his departure. The men who have been bled by Sanderson have no doubt read that presentation address in the Standard with a considerable degree of interest. Half of these presentations and addresses are got up without seriously considering whether the objects thereof are worthy the honor or not.

Another Flesherton Boy Heard From.

We are pleased to learn that Master Newton Henderson—eldest son of J. W. Henderson, Esq., Toronto, formerly of Flesherton—after passing a successful term with Bengough Business University, was some months ago appointed to a position in the Dominion Bank at Toronto, which he is filling very acceptably. Evidently Flesherton is a healthy place intellectually as well as physically. Go on and prosper, friend Newton.

Advancing.

We are pleased to learn that Dr. Geo. Armstrong—eldest son of Squire Armstrong of this town—is making rapid advancement in that great western city, Minneapolis. He is now in charge of St. Barnabas Hospital, the leading institution of the kind in that city. Independent of this important position, he is in the enjoyment of a large and steadily increasing practice. Our Canadian boys have a knack of rising above the mediocre wherever they go.

Left Over.

A number of communications are unavoidably held over. Will some of our correspondents endeavor to condense their letters a little more in future. We always try to accommodate our correspondents, even when their letters are unreasonably lengthy, and surely they ought to have a little mercy on us! These remarks, of course, do not apply to our very efficient staff of regular correspondents, the most of whom have the art of condensing reduced to a science.

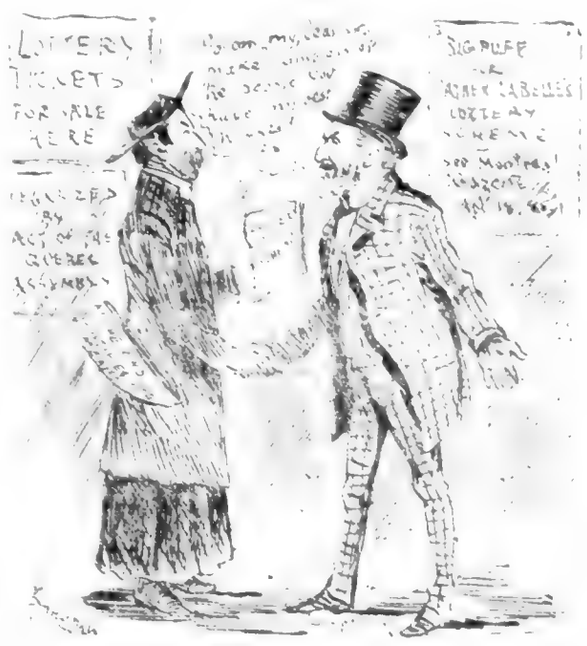
To Owners of Entire Stock.

THE FLESHERTON ADVANCE office holds a position second to none in the County—in the newspaper as well as in the job printing department—for good work. Owners of Stallions, Bills, Boars, &c., will find it to their advantage to get their work done here. Our stock of cuts is the largest, without exception, to be found within a radius of thirty miles. We fearlessly challenge competition in every department of our business. Try us and we will soon convince you that we make no idle boasts.

CANADIAN CLIMATE.—The Canadian climate is particularly productive of cold in the head and catarrh. In fact Catarrh today is more prevalent than any other disease. The discovery of Nasal Balm places within the reach of all a certain means of cure.

Flesherton Roller Mill running.

Wheezing, gasping sufferers from Asthma receive quick and permanent relief by using Southern Asthma Cure. Sold by druggists or by mail on receipt of price.



"The apparel oft proclaims the man," but it would be hard to say whether you are man or woman with those petticoats on! Its a shame for any man to go round in such duds when a well made, neat fitting, complete suit can be had for $4.75 at Richardson & Co's, Flesherton.

REMOVED.

Booth the Boss Barber,

Has removed from one of the shops on Wm. Strain's block, to Wm. Barnhart's boot and shoe shop, Toronto street, where he will be happy to see the smiling faces of his old customers, and as many new ones as may conclude to give me a chance to maintain my reputation as the Boss Barber—not only of Flesherton, but of the entire district for twenty miles around.

The patronage of the ladies respectfully solicited.

SWINDLING EXTRAORDINARY.

The Remarkable Career of an Impostor and an Adventuress.

HOW SHE WORKED HER DUPES.

(Scottish American Journal.)

It was only in a recent number that we announced in these columns that Mrs. Gordon Baillie, the champion of the Skye crofters, who eighteen months ago left for Australia and New Zealand to negotiate for the establishment of Scotch village fishing settlements there, had now returned to Scotland—that she had acquired large seaboard tracts in both Tasmania and Australia, and that she was confident the British Government would assist her in transferring the crofters to these new homes. The fact will scarcely be credited that she turns out to be one of the greatest impostors and adventuresses that ever lived, and numbers among her dupes people of almost all ranks and classes, including even the famous Emeritus Professor Blackie, of Edinburgh. That she really was in Australia about a year ago, and entered upon negotiations for the purchase of large tracts of land, may be said to be the only thing true of the woman and her story.

Mrs. Gordon Baillie is not a wealthy, large proprietress of land in Skye and elsewhere in Scotland, who can lay good claim to being a "daughter of the Earl of Moray," and in her own right "Countess of Moray." She is the daughter of a Dundee washerwoman, and was by her given the name of Mary Ann Bruce Sutherland. Mary, however, early proved that she had a soul above washing. She picked up some education, and prior to 1869 was engaged as an evening teacher in the Model Lodging-house of Dundee. Then Mary proceeded to London. There she somehow found the ways and means for travelling on the Continent during the next three years, and even went as far as Rome. In September 1872 Mary returned to Dundee, but despised her mother's humble abode, and took up her quarters in a temperance hotel. After staying there about a month she took Whitefield Cottage, situated in the outskirts of Dundee, where she brought her mother to live with her. The cottage she furnished at the expense of the tradesmen. They were not the only ones Mary defrauded and victimized. The result was that Mary, in December, 1872, was tried on numerous charges of fraud, found guilty and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. One jeweller was taken in to the tune of £200 and three prominent cirizens contributed liberally to Mary's "scheme for establishing schools in Switzerland." Before discharging her from prison the officials had Mary's photograph taken, and it leaves no doubt of Mary and Mrs. Gordon Baillie being one and the same individual.

On leaving Dundee prison Mary again hied off to London. Her doings there for three years have not yet been traced. In 1876, however, she was discovered renting an establishment at Beattock, Dumfriesshire, under the aristocratic name of "Miss Annie Ogilvie Bruce." While there she victimized large numbers of Edinburgh tradesmen, besides quite "taking in" there a gentleman of the press, whose acquaintanceship she afterwards utilized to purpose on returning to the metropolis. While in that gentleman's company at a theatre in Edinburgh she became enamored of one of the actors called "Knight Aston," and soon hurried back to London with the avowed purpose of going on the stage so as to meet him. Ere leaving, however, she got a letter of introduction from the Edinburgh journalist to a friend of his, an editor of a London paper. On arriving in London she astounded the editor by soliciting his practical assistance in purchasing a newspaper, assuring him that her means were ample, but nothing came of this proposal beyond securing the editor as a warm friend. Miss Bruce soon took a grand house in St. James' Terrace, Regent Park, which she lavishly furnished at the expense of the tradesmen.

Though the parish register of Marylebone shows that Annie Ogilvie Bruce was on 1st November, 1876, married to Thomas Whyte, alias Knight Aston, she did not adopt her husband's plebeian name, but continued to be known as Miss Annie Ogilvie Bruce. Under that name she figured at the Mansion House, London, in connection with a charge against one Kate Miller of conspiring to defraud a number of merchants. One firm mercer had been taken in to the extent of £200, while another had supplied baby linen to the value of £17 10s. At this crisis a friend of Miss Bruce's was solicited to relieve her, but he replied that he had already parted with £5,000, and that was as much as he could see his way to part with in twelve months. At this inquiry at the Mansion House Miss Bruce posed as the daughter of an Earl. Kate Miller got out on bail and nothing farther has been traced of the case.

The next heard of Miss Bruce appears in anxious inquiries in the London Trade Protection Circular of January, 1864, for "Miss Bruce," "Mrs. White," and "T. Henry" alias "Toler"—the latter turning out to have been her Secretary in ordering most of the goods. In 1865 Miss Bruce again visited Edinburgh, where she had her portrait taken in grand style, and the account for it is still unpaid.

Miss Bruce's next public appearance, so far as traced, was as "Mrs. Gordon Baillie, the crofters' champion." She did not, however, sail to Australia under that name, nor yet as Mrs. Whyte. She was accompanied by a "gentlemanly-looking" man, and the two booked as second-cabin passengers, giving the names of "Mr. and Mrs. Matthews." On landing Mr. Matthews became "Mr. Frost," and Mrs. Matthews starred it as "Mrs. Gordon Baillie, the crofters' friend." Her career during her year's sojourn in Australia is too long a tale. Suffice it to say that she there succeeded in imposing on Bishop Sandford, of Tasmania, and convinced him that she was the veritable Mrs. Gordon Baillie, and an old friend of his family. Rev. Dr. Cameron Lees also met her there, but he was far from being convinced, and expressed his doubts to the bishop, who, however, succeeded in at least silencing the worthy doctor; and so Mrs. Gordon Baillie was permitted to enter into negotiations for the purchase of large tracts of lands to form crofter villages. Regarding these negotiations, however, nothing very definite is as yet known.

The next heard of Mrs. Gordon Baillie, is on her return to England, when the Pall Mall Gazette, of London, on 9th January last, under the heading of "How to help the crofters," published an interview with her, including a long account of her work on the crofters' behalf, and her own likeness. Next the same Gazette announced that Mrs. Gordon Baillie had gone to Scotland on her mission of mercy to the crofters, and had visited Edinburgh in passing. The wealthy, large-landed proprietress, Mrs. Gordon Baillie, really then went from London to Edinburgh, travelling as a third-class passenger, and the "gentlemanly-looking" man saw her off. At Edinburgh she called on Professor Blackie, and actually dined with him, presenting him on the occasion with a grand bouquet, priced at a sovereign. From the Professor she got a letter of introduction to the Lord Provost, and through him got admitted to and saw the Clashmore crofter women, imprisoned in Calton jail. Thereafter "as a mother," she appealed to the women of Scotland, "and more particularly to those women who know what it is to be a mother with a young child at her breasts, to do their best to see that the sentence passed upon these most unfortunate women, if it cannot be revoked, will at least be considerably shortened." In Edinburgh she resided in first-class private lodgings, hired a carriage and pair, and also a lady amanuensis, but the hounds of the law were on her track and she had abruptly to end her visit. Ere leaving she appears to have paid all her bills, except that for the Professor's bouquet, and a balance due her amanuensis. In returning she again travelled third-class, and on reaching London the "gentlemanly-looking" man was waiting to welcome her.

A fascinated journalistic correspondent of the Pall Mall, writing from Liverpool about this lady as she appeared about 1873 in that tolerably wicked city, breaks out in the following gushingly charitable strains:

"Mrs. Gordon Baillie was then a charming Miss Sutherland Bruce, who was full of a scheme for getting up a girls' school in Rome on Protestant principles. Her project did not seem unreasonable, and Miss Sutherland Bruce seemed, by her earnestness and sweet manners, a suitable person to undertake it, although she expressed her religious convictions rather oddly. She had a beautiful, frank face, deep, earnest eyes, a graceful figure, a sweet voice, and gentle, sympathetic manners. She was soberly but most becomingly dressed. I recollect thinking her bonnet was perfection for a pretty woman bent on a philanthropic mission. She made a round of visits to certain rich and generous merchants of Liverpool, and she won them all to a belief in her purpose so far as to collect a considerable, probably a large, sum of money. She was the guest of relatives of my own near Liverpool during part of the time. She gave me the very faintest indication of some heart sorrow she had had; the tears came into her eyes, but she checked them as she alluded to it in a sad, low voice. On leaving she gave an address in London, where she was not known. She soon wrote to me from London that she had changed her London address and was starting for Rome. Tradespeople in Liverpool then began to write to me to know where she was to be found, as she had left debts unpaid. Among other things she had purchased a gorgeous sealskin cloak, worth perhaps £20 or £30. The next I heard was that she had been seen by a friend of mine driving about Rome in a pretty pony carriage, which, with the seal skin cloak, she was enjoying at the expense of the kind Liverpool merchants. No school was ever started. It is difficult to set the charming creature down as wholly a swindler. She seems to be one of those strange creatures who appeared now and again in society, born with a taste for intrigue and robbery, and probably, through an absence of all moral sense, hardly able to know truth from falsehood."

A Paralyzed Bridegroom.

A recent despatch from Bethel, Ky., says: Two years ago Calvin Stowers, whose wife had been expected to die with pulmonary disease for several months, was called to her bedside to say farewell. She placed a small iron ring that she had ordered made for the purpose on the third finger of the left hand, and extorted an oath that he would never marry again. Then she died contentedly, saying that if he broke his word she would haunt and ruin his life. Recently he was married to Emma Brickel, a girl to whom he was engaged before his marriage, but they had disagreed. The ceremony was a private one, only a few friends witnessing the rites. The bride took the ring from his finger, saying it was superstitious to regard a wish so selfish. Within two hours following the bridegroom's left side was paralyzed, strangely enough beginning in the finger that had worn the fatal ring. A charm-worker in the neighborhood declared that nothing would restore strength to the limbs but the wearing of the ring. This, it was discovered, could not be restored to its place, being much too small, whereas it had been before amply large. The bridegroom is terror-stricken, and has apparently lost interest in his young wife. Stowers is a frugal, intelligent farmer, well known and liked, as is also his wife, who is an industrious woman, respected for her good common sense.

Ten Thousand Dollars for a Tooth.

A New York telegram says: A Swedish sailor named Frank Engman wants $10,000 damages from Dr. David S. Skinner, a Brooklyn dentist. The trial was begun yesterday before Justice Cullen and a jury in the Circuit Court of Kings County.

Engman alleges that he went to Dr. Skinner's office to have a tooth pulled and his assistant broke the molar. Serious inflammatory troubles resulted and the plaintiff had to go to a hospital where he remained a long time under treatment. A surgical operation entailing the loss of a part of the right jawbone was necessary, and for this loss, the physical pain he endured and his mental anguish he wants $10,000.

A curious phase of the suit is Dr. Skinner's emphatic assertion that Engman is mistaken in the man—in other words, that the operation was not performed in his office.

The heaviest snowstorm of the season is raging in Wales and west of Scotland.

THEIR CHIEF WAS A GIRL.

Extraordinary Confession of a Kansas School Teacher After a Murder.

A Kansas City despatch says: For some weeks burglaries had been frequent at Columbus and other points in southern Kansas. Last Friday night the safe in the railway depot at that place was blown open. The next night the Sheriff and Constable David Gordon set to work to watch the house of suspected persons. Saturday morning Gordon's dead body, riddled with buckshot, was found near the house of a family named Blalock. The condition of the shrubbery showed that the shots were fired from the Blalock yard, and the father, mother and daughters were arrested, but the boys had disappeared. Sunday it was announced Clara Blalock, the eldest daughter, had confessed everything. The girl, a handsome brunette 20 years of age, had graduated at the head of her class at the Columbus High School last spring and had been appointed a teacher in the First Ward School last autumn. She had the respect of all classes and was regarded as one of the most promising young girls in the town. Therefore the surprise was the greater when she confessed that she saw her brothers John and William get their guns, steal from the house to the shrubbery, where William took careful aim and murdered the constable in cold blood. When the boys returned to the house she and her mother fixed them up for escape, and made arrangements to supply them with food and ammunition until they could safely return. All this was told in the coolest matter-of-fact way. Search of the Blalock house was made Sunday, and a secret recess under the roof was found, in which were all manner of stolen goods, including a mail sack, chickens, salted in a barrel, and jewellery. There was also found a box containing a vast amount of correspondence, showing that Clara Blalock, the teacher, was secretary and treasurer of an extensive gang of burglars, and she received and divided the spoils as well as arranged many of the details. She was then searched, and letters were found sewed in her dress giving the location of several stolen horses and telling her to send for them. The same day the boys were arrested while hiding in the garret of a school-house. Other members of the gang are also under arrest.

SOUGHT A TERRIBLE DEATH.

An Insane Woman Soaks Her Clothes in Coal Oil and Sets Herself on Fire.

A Parkersburg, W. Va., despatch says: Information reached here to-day of the terrible suicide of Mrs. Joseph Parker, near Stewartstown. She was a young woman, with a husband and three children. For some time, on account of prolonged physical infirmities, she had become very much depressed in mind, and at times required close watching to prevent her from doing violence to herself. Yesterday she took advantage of her husband's absence to kill herself in the following terrible manner: Leaving her infant with a servant, she repaired to a stable and saturated her clothing with coal oil. Then she lighted a match and set herself on fire. The pain apparently restored her to her senses. A few minutes afterward she came from the building on fire from head to foot. The servant, who was still holding the child, rushed up to save her, but the woman beat her off with one hand and with the other made frantic efforts to clasp her infant to her arms. The servant threw down the child and endeavored to smother the flames, when the woman ran away. Two men came to the rescue, and she was secured, with nearly all her clothing burned off and her body horribly scorched. Her hair was burned off and her face presented a terrible appearance, one eye being closed. When medical aid reached her she was more crazed than ever, and resisted all efforts to ease her pain. She died a terrible death in a few hours. The men who pursued her were burned in their efforts to smother the flames. Her husband did not reach home till shortly before she died, and is overcome with grief.

GROSS BRUTALITY.

A Father Punishes His Son With a Red-Hot Poker.

A Detroit despatch says: Humane Agent Vhay is investigating a case of extraordinary and extreme cruelty at 165 Harrison avenue. It is that of George Woltemuth, a brakeman. His wife says that he has repeatedly punished his 3-year-old boy in an unusually harsh manner, but that last Sunday, on a provocation which is liable to occur with any child of that age, he burned the child with a hot poker, so that his back, arms and legs are blistered. The child has been taken away by friends of the family to Springwells for safety, and the matter will be laid before William A. Moore, the attorney of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the brute will be prosecuted.

A Pastor Weeps for his Dogs.

A Boston despatch says: Rev. W. W. Downs preached a queer funeral sermon in Paine Memorial Hall yesterday, being no less than a long eulogy on two of his pet dogs who dropped off in a rather suspicious manner. Mr. Downs said: "I come to-day to preach the funeral sermon of two dear, very dear, friends of mine. Those two faithful friends were my favorite setter dogs, Di and Floss, who were poisoned in my back yard by some miscreant yesterday. When I left home they followed me to the gate. When I returned they were cold and stiff in death. I wept. I was not ashamed to weep." He then delivered a long eulogy on his canine friends. When he was done about one-third of his audience was crying, while the rest smiled.

An Aged but Active Prelate.

A St. John, N. B., despatch says: The Metropolitan will attend the Pan-Anglican Council in June. His son, Canon Medley, of Sussex, will accompany him as secretary. Bishop Medley is said to be the oldest working bishop in the world, but he bears his 84 years as lightly as many bear three-score. He has had charge of this diocese forty-three years.

It is said that the result of the visit of the King of Roumania to Vienna is a definite treaty under which Austria pledges herself to resist any violation of Roumanian territory.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

PARLIAMENT HOUSE, TORONTO, March 23 afternoon.—The Ontario Legislature was prorogued at 3 o'clock this afternoon. There was an entire absence of military display except the guard of honor from the School of Infantry. Lieut.-Governor Campbell delivered the following

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly:

In relieving you from further attendance upon your legislative duties, I desire to express my appreciation of the diligence and zeal with which you have applied yourselves to the business of the session now about to close.

I trust that experience will show the wisdom of the Bill which you have passed for giving (with few exceptions) to every male citizen who is 21 years of age, and a resident of the Province for a specified time, a vote for the election of members of this Assembly.

I have noted with much satisfaction the Bill which you have passed for the closing of shops and for the limitation of the hours of labor therein by children and young persons. I am sure that the powers conferred upon municipalities by this Bill will, if carefully exercised, promote the physical health and the moral and mental improvement of many whose daily tasks, unduly prolonged, deprive them of needed rest and relaxation.

I am much gratified with the measures which you have adopted for the more convenient and efficient administration of justice in Manitoulin and the adjacent islands, and in the districts of Muskoka and Parry Sound. As the settlements in the districts of Muskoka and Parry Sound now cover nearly the whole area of these districts, their future development can best be promoted by means of the ordinary municipal machinery which, in the older portions of the Province, has been found so useful to all classes of the community; and I shall be glad to learn before long that the inhabitants of these districts have availed themselves of the municipal powers which you have placed at their disposal.

The measures which you have passed relating to our educational institutions, to the municipal and assessment laws, to the transfer of personal property, to the administration of justice throughout the Province, to the executive authority in Provincial affairs, and to various other subjects, will, I have no doubt, subserve the public interest and facilitate the ends which these measures were designed to promote.

The large number of important Private Bills which you have passed, for purposes not provided for by the General Laws, manifest the ever-increasing needs of an active population.

I observe with interest that the resolutions adopted at the Inter-Provincial Conference held in Quebec in October last have met with your approval. While it is not desirable that constitutional changes should be made until experience has shown that they are necessary, it is unquestionably your privilege to advise such amendments as in your judgment are in harmony with the federal character of the constitution, and are at the same time calculated to remove friction between the Province and the Dominion.

Your proposal to inquire, by Royal Commission, into the extent of our mineral resources and the best means for promoting their development, is a movement of which I heartily approve. I trust that the inquiry will result in the introduction of new capital into the Province, and the establishment of prosperous settlements in districts at present unoccupied.

I have assented with pleasure to the Bill for the appointment of a Minister of Agriculture. The large export of farm products and the almost illimitable extent to which the soil may be made to contribute to the wealth of the country, amply justify the most energetic efforts on the part of the Legislature as well as a liberal expenditure of public funds to promote the development of the agricultural resources of the Province.

I thank you for the liberal appropriations which you have made for the public service. The supplies which you have granted will be expended with care and in the public interest.

AMONG THE GERMANS.

Press Attacks on Dr. Mackenzie—Hatred of the Empress.

A Berlin cable says: Dr. Mackenzie, in a letter to a prominent physician of Stettin, says: "What you heard of my conduct in reference to the performance of the operation of tracheotomy upon Emperor Frederick at San Remo was untrue. I controlled the patient's pulse and was the first to congratulate Dr. Bramann upon the success of the operation. As the operation was performed at my urgent request, it is self-evident that I cannot make a remark minimizing its importance."

A cartoon issued by the newspaper called the Floh excites much comment. It represents the Crown Prince trying to climb on the throne, sword in hand, the army behind him. The invalid Emperor stands on the throne, pushing his son back, remarking "Not yet." The people are hissing this on the streets and showing their sympathy with the Crown Prince.

The attacks of the Berlin press upon Dr. Mackenzie have become so persistent and virulent that surprise is expressed on all sides that the authorities have not resorted to prosecution of the offenders. Had any German been so shamefully abused by the newspapers of the capital, the offending editors would have found themselves in the clutches of the law in short order. The savage articles hurled at Dr. Mackenzie do him no harm, but they undoubtedly do serve to intensify the already bitter hatred of the people toward the Empress, and this fact furnishes the strongest reason why the authorities should prevent their further publication.

Rev. T. H. Brown, of Comber, has been appointed Chaplain to the Bishop of Huron. He will begin his duties after Easter.

The sureties of Rev. J. Stonehouse, the alleged blackmailer, who failed to put in an appearance on Friday at Strathroy, are Rev. Messrs. McDonagh and Middleton. They have little expectation that Mr. Stonehouse will return and are now liable for the payment of $200 each.

BOLDEST BIGAMIST YET.

Arrest of a Man With Seven Living Wives and Twenty Bogus Diplomas.

A Findlay, Ohio, despatch says: Sheriff Cusac to-night arrested and lodged in jail Dr. J. M. Chaplin on a charge of bigamy preferred against him by his seventh living wife, a lady from Greenville, Ind. An investigation of the Doctor's record now in the hands of the prosecuting attorney of Wood county stamps him as being the champion bigamist and rascal of the age. He has been the husband of ten different women, seven of whom are still living, and from not one of whom was he ever divorced. The Doctor came to this city about two months ago, and hanging out his shingle, began the practice of medicine. It was noticed he did but little in this line, and about three weeks ago he was married to Mrs. Laura Freberger, a widow living in North Baltimore, who had over $12,000 in ready money in her own right, besides valuable property.

The announcement of the marriage reached one of his wives living at Greenville, Ind., to whom he was married last August, and two months later abandoned after securing what money she possessed. Since that time this woman has devoted herself to running down the doctor's history, with the startling result that she found that he had a wife living at Fresno, Cal.; one at Russellville, Ky.; one at Madison, Wis.; one at East St. Louis, Ill., and another in Connecticut, besides herself, not counting the latest victim, the widow above named. Armed with letters from each of these ladies and documents proving their claims as the lawful wives of the gay deceiver, she came here, and, laying her proofs before the prosecuting attorney, swore out a warrant for Chaplin's arrest, and he was soon in custody. Certificates of marriage to three women—one in Maine, one in Pennsylvania and another in Michigan—were found in his trunk, thus swelling the total number of his marriages to ten. Whether these last named are yet alive is not known.

About twenty bogus medical diplomas were also found, indicating that he had been practising medicine under various names, the most frequent used being Dr. Orin L. Barton. Chaplin is about 40 years old, dresses well, is of dark complexion and well built, and has a plausible way about him well calculated to secure confidence. His last wife is nearly prostrated over his arrest and the unpleasant disclosures which have been made to-night.

A later despatch says: Chaplin says to-night he will stand no trial at which all the women he has deceived will appear as witnesses, but will plead guilty and have it over as soon as possible.

The prosecuting attorney received a telegram this morning from Seattle, W. T., signed by Laura E. Chaplin, to the effect that she was one of the doctor's wives, and that, accompanied by her father, would start at once for Findlay to testify against the man who had deceived and deserted her, and had robbed her of $900, the accumulations of years as a music teacher. If this woman's story proves true she will be the eleventh known victim of the doctor's wives.

CONCERNING POPE LEO.

Clad in a Robe of Scarlet Velvet That Weighed Heavily Upon Him.

In view of the recent despatch from Rome with respect to the marked feebleness of the Roman Pontiff the following extract from a private letter printed in the Boston Advertiser will have special and timely interest:

It was at the canonization of saints. The Pope came in a golden chair, carried on four men's shoulders. Beside him were the superb ostrich fans and banners unfurled. When he had taken his seat on the throne the Cardinals knelt before him and kissed his hand, and when he raised his hand right and left to give his blessing the crowd fell on their knees. It was a magnificent sight. The Ambassadors were in full dress. The Hungarian wore a ruby velvet cloak with priceless fur. The Duke of Norfolk, who had come with a letter to the Pope from Queen Victoria, was in scarlet and gold, with the garter. Many of them were blazing with orders on their breasts of diamonds, but all were eclipsed by the Pope's robe of scarlet velvet, so heavy with embroidery that he could not stand in it, and had to be held up by attendants. He was dressed underneath in white silk. He looked weary and sick, almost too feeble to raise his hand to give the blessing. But you never saw anything so fine as the Swiss Guards, in their red and yellow suits—designed by Michael Angelo himself—and white plumes; nor the cardinals in their scarlet caps and violet robes, with immense trains; nor the bishops, in their tunics and exquisite lace; nor the court chamberlains, who looked as if they had just stepped out of a picture frame, in black velvet and long hose, with ruffs around their necks and gold chains on their breasts.

One Eye Put Out by an English Sparrow.

An Omaha, Neb., despatch says: Barton M. Mills, a travelling salesman in the employ of Johnson, Reeves & Co., of Lynn, Mass., met with a peculiar and painful accident this morning. Mr. Mills alighted from a carriage at the railroad station entrance and proceeded to walk around the depot to go to the baggage-room. Just as he reached the southwest corner something struck him fairly in the eye and knocked him down. The cause of his mishap was an English sparrow. The bill of the bird penetrated the eyeball and the unfortunate man will lose the eye. The bird was picked up dead and one of its eyes was closed, so it is evident that it did not see the gentleman, as Mr. Mills was close to the wall.

The names for money in the language of the Ogallalla Sioux are interesting. Gold is masea-ska-zi, literally, "yellow white iron;" silver is masea-ska-ska, or "white iron," and greenbacks are minne-huapi-masea-ska, or "paper that talks white iron."

A careless farmer on Saturday ran into a buggy driven by Mrs. D. H. Tennent, at London, upsetting the vehicle and throwing the lady out. The fellow drove on without stopping to see what he had done. Fortunately the lady was uninjured, but her horse took fright and not only smashed the carriage to which it was attached, but demoralized two other rigs before it could be checked.

His conversion is so thorough that he has decided to abandon his lucrative practice and enter the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

J. W. WATSON, to whom the authorship of "Beautiful Snow" is most generally ascribed, is a tall, straight man of 70, who is often seen about the streets of New York. He is a novelist as well as a writer of verses, and much of his matter is seen in the periodicals, but his income from his writings is not large. Mr. Watson claims to be the inventor of roller skates.

MISS AMELIE RIVES, the Virginia authoress, lives in practical seclusion on her father's large farm near Cobham, in Albemarle county, Va. She is 23 years old, tall, slender and graceful, a perfect blonde and very pretty. In addition to her literary talent she is somewhat of an artist, and spends a great part of her time in her studio. She is passionately fond of horses and dogs.

REAR ADMIRAL HENEAGE, the officer commanding the British Pacific station, is earning the epithet of "Sir Joseph Porter." He has forbidden any officer or man to walk on the poop of the flagship while he is there, and insists on the crew uncovering their heads as long as he is on deck. He also requires his officers to wear white kid gloves at divisions on Sundays, and to have their frock coats and tunics buttoned on all occasions.

THE French astronomers are making wonderful strides in celestial discovery, thanks to the hypersensitive plates which modern photography has placed at their service. The photographer's plate is infinitely more sensitive than the retina of the human eye. One part of the heavens has just been photographed where only 150 stars had been previously known. The plate shows no fewer than 5,000, all sufficiently distinct.

FRANCIS MURPHY, the temperance advocate, wants a law passed making it a crime for a man to treat or be treated. Upon this subject Mr. Murphy said in Buffalo last week: "It is an awful thing for a man to say no when he has not been weaned. Look at the effect on a baby that has been on the bottle for two years when you undertake to wean it. What, think you, must it be with a man who has been on a bottle for twenty years?"

MARIA MITCHELL, the celebrated professor of astronomy at Vassar College, is 70 years old. She is the discoverer of eight comets, the discovery of one of which gained her a gold medal from the King of Denmark, and it is said that when she was a girl of 11 she made an accurate record of a lunar eclipse. She has received the degree of LL. D. from three different institutions of learning.

A NOVELTY in use by many ladies in the States this cold weather is the "Kairo," or Japanese hand warmer. It is an oblong, slightly curved box of sheet copper, covered with pretty chintz or silk, and heated by ignited charcoal, specially prepared for the purpose. The charcoal comes in neat rolls, each of which will burn five hours, producing a temperature of 150 degrees and warming one nicely. The "Kairo" costs a dollar and is sold in drug stores. In Japan it is used for medical purposes, just as we apply poultices or hot fomentations.

A NEW kind of glass has been invented in Sweden. It contains no fewer than fourteen substances, whereas the common kind of glass contains only six. Phosphorous and borax are included, and they are not to be found in any other glass. The result is, according to those who believe in the new invention, that whereas the highest power of an old fashioned microscopic lens reveals only the one-four-hundred-thousandth part of an inch, this new glass will enable us to distinguish one two-hundred-and-four-million-seven-hundred-thousandth part of an inch. Stupendous—but, then, who on earth wants to have a look at the 1-204,700,000th part of an inch?

The German inhabitants of the Baltic are mostly Lutherans. The determination of the Russian Government seems to be to compel religious conformity, and the Minister of the Interior has been authorized to suspend or banish Lutheran pastors without any judicial inquiry. Some fifty preachers in Livonia have been warned and as many in Courland. In Esthonia several pastors' wives have been marked out for punishment for holding missionary meetings. It is believed that if the Emperor was aware of the real conditions a more humane policy would be adopted, but united action of the people is rendered impossible, and any attempt to appeal would only aggravate the evil.

SOME time ago an engineer on the Little Miami Railroad, Ohio, was suspended because, after having been examined by Dr. Clark, he was found to be quite deaf. The engineer claimed at the time that he could hear everything while running his engine, but the doctor found that in a still room he could not hear ordinary conversation a foot away. The doctor thought he would test the case, and made a number of experiments with him on engines. The result was that the doctor found the engineer not only telling the truth in regard to the matter, but also that the deaf man could hear low remarks and whispers on a moving engine, that even Dr. Clark's keen ear failed to catch. The engineer was reinstated.

THE women will shortly abandon those furry caterpillars they wear around their necks, and man's fur-lined overcoat with its Russian collar and cuffs will disappear into its camphor chest. It is a pity that furs which are alike becoming to the thick and the thin, the tall and the short, cannot be perpetually with us, and that the first warm day should make them oppressive. Some one has said woman is always willing to suffer if she can be beautiful, but she rarely shows how ungrateful she can be as at this time of year when one of her chief embellishments is thrown aside. She does not desire "to suffer" exactly to the degree of overheating a well made-up complexion, and she doubtless thinks that her tinted parasol, with other airy confections from the haberdashers, will compensate for the soft, dark frame about her face. Perhaps so. But it is with regret that elegantes, and those who understand the art of being well-dressed, find the time approaching when their most becoming portion of attire must seek an anti-moth seclusion. Try to make the best of it, mesdames!

YOUNG ladies whose complexions show the ravages of the late hours of the first season and who wish to restore their skin to its prestine debutante freshness are, writes a Washington correspondent, using "le masque du mari," which Frenchwomen have employed since the days of la Reine Margot, who invented this faded complexion's sweet restorer. They take the white of one egg beaten in sufficient rose water to make a cream; to this they add one gramme of alum and one of sweet almond oil. All of which is beaten together until a paste is formed, white and sweet smelling. Then taking a piece of thick muslin they cut holes in such a way that it rudely resembles a mask—two for eyes, a small one for nostrils, the third a little larger for the mouth. The paste is spread thickly and carefully over this. Four tapes are fastened to it—two at the brow and two at the chin—and when the young woman goes to bed this is tied on her face and remains there all night. In the morning she washes this off carefully with a soft sponge and tepid water, following it by another bath of water running cold from the faucet, and then she rubs her face vigorously with a soft towel and emerges with the complexion of sixteen. But she looks decidedly funny at night when she has her mask on, which resembles a poultice more than anything else. There is also a rule which goes with this masque du mari which says that to have a beautiful skin a woman must take enough exercise at least once in every twenty-four hours to be thrown into a thorough glow.

THREE Philadelphia fiends who used chrome yellow in making buns have been sentenced to the penitentiary, two of them for six months each and the third one for nine months, the judge expressing his sorrow that the statute did not permit him to mete out punishment adequate to the offence.

THE Duchess of Hamilton, wife of the Premier Peer of Scotland, and sister-in-law to Lady Mandeville, has opened a retail butcher shop at Ipswich, in the neighborhood of the White Horse Inn immortalized by Pickwick, and is, according to latest reports, crowded with orders.

ALTHOUGH the cheapest rate for which board can be got in the big new hotel in Florida is $8 a day, and an extra particular bridegroom can obtain a bridal suite there at $2,000 a week, the hotel was packed on the first of the month. The owner talks of putting up just such another house in New York for the exaction of just such gilt-edged prices, and thinks there will be money in it.

NEXT Sunday will be the eighteenth anniversary of the proclamation of the commune. The socialists, anarchists and communists of New York are preparing to celebrate it with gusto galore. A blood and thunder drama will be presented by the Social Revolutionary Club on Saturday night, to be followed by a ball and a great demonstration to be held in Clarendon Hall.

THE soft maple has not been satisfactory as a shade tree for street or lawn, and for this reason has been condemned and tabooed by horticultural writers, and its value as a timber tree has been lost sight of. When closely planted in a grove the tendency to split or break is overcome. It is easy of propagation, transplants well grows rapidly, and is one of the best trees for fuel.

BASSWOOD may be enormously compressed after which it may be steamed and expanded to its original volume. Advantage has been taken of this principle in the manufacture of certain kinds of moldings. The portions of the wood to be left in relief are first compressed or pushed down by suitable dies below the general level of the board, then the board is planed down to a level surface, and afterward steamed. The compressed portions of the board are expanded by the steam so that they stand out in relief.

THE influence of the moon upon vegetation is an interesting problem awaiting solution. A recent writer upon the subject mentions that wood-cutters in Cape Colony and India insist that timber is full of sap and unfit to be cut at full moon. Another observation of lunar influence in Cape Colony is the rapid spoiling of meats and other provisions when exposed to moonlight, though this may be due to the fact that the light serves as a guide to insects.

AN extraordinary incident is reported from Edinburgh in connection with the trial of the Lewis crofters. One of the Crown witnesses named Donald Macleod had never before been absent from Lewis, and his being brought to Edinburgh seems to have deranged his mind. On Tuesday he behaved as if suffering from hydrophobia, and on Wednesday morning he was brought into court howling like a dog. On the doctor's certificate of insanity he was sent to an asylum.

SOME time ago it was announced that human footprints in rocks had been discovered in America. At last week's meeting of the Victoria Institute in London, a report, with photograph, from one of its geological members resident in the district, was read, stating that researches showed them to be imprinted in anciently deposited lava, and in some cases the imprints were those of people wearing curiously made sandals or moccasins.

A BOSTON theatrical manager began an advertisement in the Sunday papers with the words: "A call for 100 women to sew on buttons dislocated by laughter." To his surprise he found the theatre lobby filled the next morning with women who took the announcement seriously and wanted a job. He appeased them as well as he could by distributing among them tickets to his performance. This, the Buffalo Courier says, is not nearly as nice a story as the one about the little girl who found as the closing sentence in one of the tales of the Brothers Grimm: "And all who do not believe this must pay a dollar." Whereupon she called one morning upon Jacob Grimm and proffered her one dollar in the most matter of fact way to the astonished story-teller.

MISS CORA BACKUS, who compelled a prominent Rockford, Ill., physician to print an abject apology for slandering her, has received many letters of admiration and offers of marriage. Cora's picture represents a fluffy-haired girl with pleasing and regular features. A farmer near Huron, Dak., who says he has as good a farm as there is in the territory, writes that he wishes to tell her how much he admires her "for the way you beat that doctor who abused you," and that "It madd me ful of luv for you," and if she will marry him he will come on the next train. A Chicago man who says he has an income of $5,000 a year and a good home wants her to name a day next week. A youth at Rock Island writes that he has a small salary, but he loves her very much and he is sure that with such a brave woman for a wife they can get along very nicely on a narrow margin. Miss Backus answers the letters of sympathy and puts the offers of marriage into a scrap book.

Masonic.

Lord Stanley of Preston, the new Governor-General, is a Past Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of England, and is reported as taking an active interest in Masonic affairs.

The twenty-third annual reunion of the A. A. A. Scottish Rite co-ordinate bodies in Rochester will occur on April 10th, 11th and 12th. During the three-days' session aspirants for the mysteries of the ineffable, historical, doctrinal, chivalric and philosophical grades will be gratified with the investiture, which embraces all the realistic teachings from fourth degree to thirty-second degree.

One of the most peculiar incidents connected with a lodge meeting which has ever come under our notice transpired at an emergent communication of St. John's Lodge, No. 209a, on Thursday night last. Four candidates presented themselves for degrees—two for the first, one for the second, and the other for the third—and every one of them were members of the medical profession of this city. Indeed, had it not been for an inopportune call, a fifth would also have been in attendance for his third degree. Such an occurrence may not happen again in the history of the craft, and for this reason it is noted.—London Free Press.

Abbotsford to be Rented.

Some of the papers have been agitated by a report that Abbotsford is for sale. The real truth is that the place is only in the market to be let for a term of years, and I shall be surprised if it finds a tenant, as it is overrun throughout the year with shoals of tourists. The house is large and gloomy, and there is nothing remarkably pretty about the demesne or neighborhood. Abbotsford now belongs to Sir Walter Scott's great-granddaughter, Mrs. Maxwell-Scott, who is a granddaughter of Lockhart.—London Truth.

Bobby Makes a Bad Break.

A story is told of a little boy, one of whose duties it was to recite a verse from the Bible, chosen by himself, every morning at the breakfast table. "Well, Bobby," said his mother to him one morning, "what verse have you learned to-day?" "Oh, I got a real easy one," replied Bobby—"'Whose wife, then, shall be in the insurrection?'" After the proper tableau had been enacted the scheme of Bobby's scripture studies was promptly revised.

What is Called the "Zero Rash."

A singular epidemic has recently appeared in this city and vicinity. It seemed to follow immediately after the last protracted cold wave, and manifested itself in the shape of a rash similar to the nettle rash, appearing upon the legs, arms and body of the afflicted. The rash especially manifested itself in the parts mostly exposed to the cold, like the feet, hands and face. The rash appeared in blotches of pale red, accompained by an intolerable itching.—Albany N. Y. Journal.

A Rich Man's Joke.

D. W. Powers has hit upon a novel idea which, if carried into execution, may be of value to other testators in making their last testaments. He said to a legal gentleman yesterday that he had made his will at last. "I've left everything to my lawyers, and recommended my family to their tender mercies. I'm sure they'll get more that way than by a contest."—Rochester Post-Express.

Truthful at all Times.

Grocer (to boy)—What are you doing, James?

James—Puttin' sand in the sugar.

Grocer—Well, that won't do. You must put the sugar in the sand, and then if a customer asks if we put sand in our sugar you can truthfully say no. You will find, James, as you acquire more business, that, in the long run, truth always pays.

Lord Tennyson is said by a London correspondent to be far from well and to feel keenly the many criticisms which his recent performances have received. His early retirement from the post of poet laureate would surprise no one there.

RICH MEN'S BEGINNINGS.

Some Chicago Experiences—Messenger Boys as Hustlers.

Instances of lowly beginnings are not rare in the list of Chicago millionaires. J. W. Doane, the President of the Merchants' Loan & Trust Company, began his commercial career in Chicago a very small dealer in peanuts. W. M. Hoyt, the wholesale grocer and founder of the immense tea trade between Chicago and China, in his youth kept a little apple stand at the door of the old Richmond Hotel, on Lake street. L. J. Gage's first work was as a carpenter in his father's box factory, on the West side. The Libby Brothers, the immensely rich packers, started as working butchers. Jacob Rosenburg, the capitalist, and Levi Rosenfeld, who died last summer, whose great fortunes were largely increased by their share in the Michael Reese $11,000,000 estate, were both peddlers and carried packs about the surrounding country. H. A. Kohn, the head of the big wholesale clothing house on Franklin street, was also a peddler. N. K. Fairbank boasts that he can lay a brick now as well as in his youth, when he worked as a mason. C. H. McCormick and Leander J. McCormick were foundrymen. The first shop they owned was a small shed on North Water street, east of Bush. B. F. Hutchinson earned his youthful wages as a shoemaker. Nelson Morris blacked boots and did chores around a small inn in the old Sherman stock-yards. Afterwards he began trading in lame hogs. C. B. Farwell's first employment in Chicago was as the smallest clerk in George Smith's bank, on Lake street. Conrad Seipp, the millionaire brewer, was a common brewery hand, and his partner, Lehmann, was a carpenter. Jerome Beecher was a common workingman. John T. Lester was a clerk in A. G. Downs' dry goods store.—Chicago News.

Among the messenger boys in the service of the first telegraph office opened in Pittsburg, Pa., years ago were four known respectively as Andy, Bob, Billy and Harry. This quartette has won both fame and fortune. "Andy" Carnegie is one of the richest men in the United States; "Bob" Pitcairn is General Agent and Superintendent of the Western Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad; "Billy" Moreland is City Attorney of Pittsburg; and "Harry" Oliver has made a fortune in steel and narrowly missed a seat in the United States Senate. Evidently the messenger boys of former times were "hustlers."—New York World.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

A Tremendous Sensation

would have been created one hundred years ago by the sight of one of our modern express trains whizzing along at the rate of sixty miles an hour. Just think how our grandfathers would have stared at such a spectacle! It takes a good deal to astonish people now-a-days, but some of the marvellous cures of consumption, wrought by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, have created wide-spread amazement. Consumption is at last acknowledged curable. The "Golden Medical Discovery," is the only known remedy for it. If taken at the right time—which, bear in mind, is not when the lungs are nearly gone—it will go right to the seat of the disease and accomplish its work as nothing else in the world can.

Mrs. Tom Blevins, the wife of a farmer living near Butler, Tenn., recently gave birth to four children, two boys and two girls. The "double twins" are all small, but are well and are likely to live.

"Had Been Worried Eighteen Years."

It should have read "married," but the proof-reader observed that it amounted to about the same thing, and so did not draw his blue pencil through the error. Unfortunately there was considerable truth in his observation. Thousands of husbands are constantly worried almost to despair by the ill health that afflicts their wives, and often robs life of comfort and happiness. There is but one safe and sure way to change all this for the better. The ladies should use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

Great Responsibility.

The wife of a revenue inspector at Beauce Que., named Mercier, is 40 years old and the mother of 27 children, a recent instalment having been triplets.

"Give Him $2, and Let Him Guess."

We once heard a man complain of feeling badly, and wondered what ailed him. A humorous friend said, "Give a doctor $2, and let him guess." It was a cutting satire on some doctors, who don't always guess right. You need not guess what ails you when your food don't digest, when your bowels and stomach are inactive, and when your head aches every day, and you are languid and easily fatigued. You are bilious, and Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets will bring you out all right. Small, sugar-coated, easy to take. Of druggists.

HIS OWN FUNERAL.

He Will Have the Coffin There and Preach the Sermon.

Mr. Pridgins, an old and respectable preacher, has suddenly decided to preach his own funeral sermon, and has set for the day the second Sunday in April, and the place a little church a few miles from High Shoals. Mr. Pridgins has ordered his son to make him a coffin, which he directs must be perfectly plain and locked with a padlock. He says the coffin will be placed by his side in the church, and there, in the presence of his friends and family, who are requested to wear mourning, he will tell of his life and pay suitable tribute to his own memory. The news has spread rapidly over the surrounding counties, and it is thought that the little church will not be able to hold the congregation. Mr. Pridgins is thought by some to be very eccentric, but is considered by his neighbors one of the smartest men in the county. He has been a minister of the gospel for many years and is extremely popular in his neighborhood. His mind is perfectly clear on all subjects, and he is unusually well informed for a country preacher. He desires that the press reporters be present at the funeral to occupy seats in the amen corner. It is thought that he will then retire to his home and lead a quiet life until the time comes for him to occupy his coffin for good. No pall-bearers have yet been selected, but all arrangements will be made for the funeral before the eventful day arrives.—Atlanta Constitution.

The Sum and Substance Of It.

A 4-year-old miss had been naughty the other day, and her mamma shut her up in a closet by way of penalty. The little one alternated between fits of crying and appeals for freedom, and was heard to say within herself: "I tell you this is tough!"

The treatment of many thousands of cases of these chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in wisely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhœa, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper and faithfully carried out for many years.

RAILWAY CROSSINGS.

During the past year people driving through the Station and across the R.R. track were frequently subjected to annoying detentions by freight trains, which the conductors thereof permitted to obstruct the highway, for periods ranging all the way from ten to forty minutes, in direct violation of section 252 of the Act respecting Railways. On one occasion the writer was detained for more than half an hour, and had it not been for the kind and energetic services of our esteemed friend, R. McGill, Esq., we might have sat in the buggy staring at the obstruction and inwardly blessing the obstructionists for another thirty minutes. The section of the Railway Act, above alluded to, makes this point so clear, that a conductor must be very thickheaded who can see enough in it to justify him in obstructing public highways any longer than five minutes at a time. We quote the clause for the benefit of the public generally :—

"Whenever any railway crosses any public highway at rail level, the company shall not, nor shall its officers, servants or agents, willfully permit any engine, tender or car, or any portion thereof, to stand on any part of such highway for a longer period than five minutes at one time; and if in any city, town or village, a train is waiting for more than five minutes, such waiting train shall be cut so as to clear the highway."

A penalty of $50 is attached for violation of the Act in this particular. Of course there are exceptional cases, but the Act takes cognizance of such. The cases in point, however, were direct violations, in each of which the above penalty was undoubtedly incurred.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The Dundalk Herald has become suddenly solemn on the incorporation question. A few weeks ago it was quite glib and merry in poking fun at Markdale; but all at once it occurred to the Herald that Dundalk is also an incorporated village, whereat its visage lengthened visibly. It is scarcely necessary to add our "pet proverb"—as the Herald terms it—"sour grapes!"

Every time the Herald writer stumbles over that imposing public structure, yclept the "penitentiary," he must be forcibly reminded of the fact that Dundalk is incorporated. It will also draw forth from his soul big pieces of sympathy for other places similarly situated. Misery likes company, you know!

As for Flesherton—well, she has wisely profited by the mistakes of neighboring villages in this matter of incorporation. She watches their movements with a keen and discerning eye and thereby avoids the pitfalls into which they tumble.

It is true we did publish an article in THE ADVANCE in reference to incorporation a short time ago. But it is not true that the reasons therein assigned in favor of the same were our own. We consulted a portion of the mirror of public opinion and then published the result in editorial form. This trick of misrepresenting what people say or write is quite popular in some quarters.

On behalf of this town, we extend our hearty thanks to our member for the Commons, Dr. Landerkin, for his efforts in behalf of Flesherton, re the Western Ontario Railroad. Although we are not hankering awfully for connection with that projected, Pipe of railway, yet we fully appreciate our member's energetic efforts in our behalf. We might add further that we have strong doubts as to whether the scheme in question will ever become a reality.

A CEDARVILLE SCARE.

Attempted Murder and a Hot Chase after the Fugitive.

A young man whose correct name has not yet been ascertained made his appearance in this village last Friday in charge of two constables. He has of late been making the house Zachariah Brown near Cedarville his temporary home and on Wednesday night, about 10 o'clock, he, with another person, being the worse of liquor proceeded on the highway to the residence of John McLuhan and began to wake up that household by swearing and shouting "Here's where the man lives that was going to shoot Brown's informer."—It is supposed that he, the culprit was "Brown's informer" having been connected with some Scott Act case in which he had acted the part of informer at Guelph.

Mr. McLuhan hearing the noise jumped out of bed, opened the door and ordered them off. This they declined to do and began firing at Mr. McLuhan. Two of the pistol shots went through some clothes that were hanging on the line and embedded themselves in the woodwork. Mr. McLuhan thought there was no fun about this and took down his rifle which had not been used for some time and pointing the muzzle at them pulled the trigger, but it mis-fired and no amount of pulling would make the gun go off. Mr. McLuhan then went to the back of his house and called the neighbors to his assistance upon whose arrival the miscreants decamped meanwhile, the culprit who sometimes gives his name Jacque Brown, threatened to go into the house and murder the whole family. He was then followed to Pete. Morris' house and allowed to remain until the morning, when a warrant was placed in the hands of William Woods, the county constable's hands for his arrest; He, W. Boyde, W. Pryde, and David Pryde armed and equipped for capturing him went to Pete Morris' house and as soon as Jacque saw his pursuers he ran upstairs and escaped out of the gable at the end of the house to Zachariah Brown's, and from there to the swamp.

Here was a pretty fix. The recent thaw made the swamp almost impassable and the outlook for capturing an armed man in such a place was not very bright, nevertheless nothing daunted the pursuers kept in the swamp all day Thursday, everyone of them being wet from head to foot. Towards evening it began to freeze and the clothes on them froze stiff with frost. Knowing that no man could stay in the swamp all night without being frozen to death, they went to Cedarville and changed their clothes and having heard that in the meantime Jacque had come out and stole into Zachariah Brown's they immediately scattered and surrounded the house. Mr. Brown did not like the idea of having his house searched and denied having seen the man. But in spite of his protest it was done and Jacque was found in an upstairs room under the bed. The handcuffs were put on him and he was taken to Cedarville, where, on the following morning he was arraigned before Don. Bell, S. Rodgers and Mr. McPherson and committed for trial at Owen Sound.

[We are indebted to the kindness of Mr. Spur, Editor of the Dundalk Herald, for the above report.—ED. ADVANCE.]

Newspapers in 1888.

From the edition of Geo. P. Rowell & Co's "American Newspaper Directory," published April 2d (its twentieth year), it appears that the Newspapers and Periodicals of all kinds issued in the United States and Canada, now number 16,310, showing a gain of 890 during the last 12 months and of 7,136 in 10 years.

The puplishers of the Directory assert that the impression that when the proprietor of a newspaper undertakes to state what has been his exact circulation, he does not generally tell the truth is an erroneous one; and they conspicuously offer a reward of $100 for every instance in their book for this year, where it can be shown that the detailed report received from a publisher was untrue.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8.

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Spurgeon and the Union.

For the Advance.

As many of your readers are interested in the discussion concerning Mr. Spurgeon and the Baptist Union, the following definitions may be helpful in understanding the question at issue :—

1.—A "Baptist" is a person who, on profession of repentance towards God and faith in Jesus Christ has been baptized (immersed) into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and united in church fellowship to observe all that Christ commanded.

2.—"A Baptist Church" is a body of baptized believers, meeting together for Christian worship, instruction and work, acknowledging no Head but the risen Saviour, and no Law but the Divine Word. Each member has a voice in all that concerns the Church, and each church manages all its own affairs; and apart from each separate independent body, there is no such thing as "the Baptist Church."

3.—"Association" is a name given to that arrangement by which the several churches in any district consent to work together in order that the strong may help the weak and all freely combine to promote the work of God.

4.—"A Baptist Union" is a purely fraternal movement, wherein, without restricting the independency of each church and the individuality of each minister, all its members may be mutually edified and united in carrying out such works as are binding upon all true believers. The Baptist Union of Great Britain has existed about 25 years, and about two-thirds of the churches and pastors are members of it. The Baptist Union of Canada has ceased to exist.

5. "Baptist Denomination" denotes the classification of all Baptists as one body; but does not signify that there is any organic unity, central control or official leader.—See def. 2.

6.—"Particular Baptist" is almost an obsolete expression but is sometimes used to describe those churches that are decidly Calvinistic in doctrine.

7. "General Baptist" denotes those churches that hold "general," or "Arminian," or "free will" views. Dr. Clifford, President of the Union, is a "general," Mr. Spurgeon a Calvinist. Neither term describes correctly the views commonly held by Baptists.

8.—Mr. Spurgeon's conference is a yearly gathering of ministers, who have been or are being trained in the "Pastor's College," of which C. H. P. is president. This conference exercises no ecclesiastical control over the ministers or the churches they are pastors of. The conference meets as a body of free Christian workers to encourage one another and consider how best they may promote the interests of Christ's kingdom.

9.—Mr. Spurgeon's relation to the Union in no way effects his denominational standing. He is, and for 33 years has been pastor of, the largest Baptist church in Great Britain; and, like any other Baptist or Congregational minister, is entirely free to follow his own convictions as to whether he will belong to any association, union, or any society outside of the local church of which he is pastor.

A Pointer for Farmers.

Durham Chronicle.

Much uneasiness prevails among farmers who purchased implements from Billy Campbell, who skipped to the other side a few weeks ago. In several instances persons who bought machines from Billy and paid him in full, have had the machines seized by the company of which he was the authorized agent, they claiming that he had not paid them for the implements. For instance, Jas. Staples, of the 3rd concession of Glenelg, bought a mower from Campbell a short time ago and gave him therefor a horse and $12.50 in cash, being payment in full. Last week the machine was seized at the instance of the company. Dennis Crimmons, of Bentinck, is just a similar case. He bought a reaper, and gave the agent a horse and $15 in cash. He had the satisfaction of paying for the machine, and now finds it seized also. J. R. Kinney bought a cutting box, for which he paid a small amount down, and had time for the balance. The company came along and demanded it. Mr. Kinney offered to give it up if the amount which he paid was refunded. This the company refused to do, and got out a writ of replevin, and the cutting box also was seized. There are others just similarly fixed. These cases will be tried at the Division Court next Wednesday, and will be watched with considerable interest, especially by farmers. We are not familiar with the law on the subject, but justice would say that a person buying a machine from a company's authorized agent, and paying that agent in full, was entitled to the machine. Companies should make their agents give security, in order to protect themselves and not be putting innocent parties to trouble and expence. The moral for farmers is to only deal with agents whom they know.

A Common Mistake.

Mt. Forest Representative.

We regret that some of our readers occasionally forget that the Rep. is a newspaper, and take umbrage at certain items of news published in its columns. We have no desire whatever to wound anyone's feelings, but when an item of news is taken exception to, we do not feel in anyway responsible. We have nothing to do with causing such news, but when they are caused they become newspaper property and our stock in trade.

The "Able" Editorial Writer of the Durham Chronicle.

From the Grey Review.

....."His (the Chronicle man's) editorial space in the same issue was filled up with Normanby council, a baking powder reading adv't about pancakes, another about some Yankee fake and yet another about Holloway's pills and ointment.—Pancakes and pills are high subjects and well deserving the gigantic efforts of the mighty brain that controls the Chronicle."

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so, send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers, there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all Druggists throughout the world. Price twenty five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular as, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Bane, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them, but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

A Spring Day Reverie.

(Edwin Hyde Carroll.)

Perchance if we had never met,
I had been spared this mad regret,
This endless longing to forget.
—Forever and Forever.

Idly humming o'er some measure
That revives some pain or pleasure
Mayhap, ling'ring thoughts of wither'd bliss, or sorrows too soon ripe—
'Mid the paling rays of daylight,
Hidden in the hush of twilight,
Fancies flutter 'round me, peeping thro' the cloud-puffs from my pipe.

Restless visions roam above me
Of the dear ones home who love me,
Twining sprays of sweet and tender mem'ries 'round my aching heart;
Of some keen regret, swift darting
Thro' the breaking heart, at parting
From love's clinging tendrils—long since broken crushed or thrust apart.

Fickle mem'ry faintly traces
Half-forgotten forms and faces;
And the pressure of some precious hand I seem to feel again;
While the scarce remember'd blisses
Of affection's holy kisses,
Steal back, vividly, to fringe the recreant heart with bitter pain.

Now and then a vague, soft murmur
Drifting nearer, sweeter, firmer,
Rouses slumb'ring recollections of some voice once dear to me
Ah! there's one regret in meeting,
'Tis the parting that comes fleeting
And some cherish'd tie is snapped asunder for eternity.

Thus the chords of mem'ry vibrate,
While fantastic portraits gyrate
Round and round my fervid fancy, to enrapture or enthrall;
Then, while more than half confessing
That the Past breathes back some blessing,
One exquisite image, rising, brings forgetfulness of all.

Faintly traced and slowly speeding,
Now advancing, now receding;
Coursing realms of imagery, while still mistrustful mem'ry sleeps
Till each rare, enhancing feature
Of this fair, entrancing creature
Is illum'd by lustrous rays of thought, through which remembrance peeps.

Then my vision quickly clearing,
Timid doubt now disappearing,
I recall the form in all its blush and bloom o girlish pride;
Feel, once more, the thrill in meeting—
Mark her cordial, graceful greeting—
View again those pure and glist'ning gems o worth, no guile could hide.

Still, the moment that I met her,
Came a yearning to forget her
For I knew how very wide apart our paths in life must lie,
But the longing, lightly cherish'd,
Waver'd, droop'd and early perish'd—
For, tho' meeting never more, exalted thoughts to her must fly.

Yet, withal, while now enraptur'd
By this culprit vision, captur'd
In its flight from Fancy's vigilance, by glad arresting eyes,
Comes a fear, I strive to banish,
That from bondage-view 'twill vanish,
Leaving only spectres of Regret behind to thrive on sighs.

Precious moments thus expire,
Disregarding dear Desire,
While the echo of Time's footfall brings it s fate ful thrill of pain;
For each tiny, fleeting minute
Bears an age of bliss wrapp'd in it,
Slowly robbing me of rapture I shall never know again.

Thus, caressing Fate comes hither
Kissing Hope—and wishes wither;
So, alas! this fair enchantress view must fade beneath the blight—
Yet, ere darkness quite conceals her,
Thro' the glow that now reveals her,
Irresistibly bewitch'd, I gaze in eager, proud delight

At this tranquil, tender fairy—
Artless, delicate and airy—
Thro' whose eyes, her soul's pure eloquence chaste beauties doth impart,
While her graces, fascinating,
And her charms, most captivating,
Seem to mirror back a grandeur and nobility o heart.

Ah! Forever and forever,
Altho' years and miles may sever,
I shall constantly remember her who seem'd divine to me,
And the Future will remind me
Of the fond Past, far behind me,
When her simple conversation seem'd the sweetest melody.

Thus, I sit and gaze and ponder—
Thus, unfetter'd, fancies wander
Until Reason ends my Reverie and all my dreams are o'er;
Then Reality o'ertakes me
And the sylph like form forsakes me—
Fading softly sweet from view but Mem'ry lives forevermore.

The Three "Rockers."

'Three rockers togother, a-rockin' slow,
On the east piazzer, all in er row,
Where are the folks, yer want ter know?
No answer comes, but the wind sighs low.

'The old house is gray with weather an' time,
The well curb is mossy an' green with slime,
Winders rattle an endless rhyme;
Nobody's here, but the cheers rock slow.

"It ain't very long sence all in er row
Three sisters sat rockin' here to and fro,
Knittin', countin' from heel to toe,
Watchin' the bay where sails come and go.

"They watched an' they waited day after day,
Not a single ship sailed inter the bay;
'Joe's long a-comin', then they say,
'Whales must be skeerce,' and they all rocked slow.

"But while they watched Mandy whitened and shrank,
And Mercy into strange silences sank,
And Marthy, she looked old and lank,
'When will Joe come?' and they rocked more slow.

"Then ther come er day when an empty cheer
Moved soft in the wind by the sister pair;
A year more passed, and Mercy there
Sat watchin' two idle rockers blow.

"Three rockers together, a rockin' slow,
Not a soul in ther place to make 'em go;
Folks are dead, if yer want ter know,
An' the lonesome sea is rockin' Joe!"

—W. H. Winslow, in Youth's Companion.

Waiting.

(By Archie Mack.)

Waiting, yes, patiently waiting,
Waiting, no murmur or moan,
Silently, hopefully waiting,
Living her life-time alone.
Patiently bearing life's burden,
Waiting the sweet by-and-by,
Daily fulfilling her mission,
Stifling the long troubled sigh.

Sadly the weeks follow swiftly,
Sad, oh, more sad grow they still,
By months and years they are numbered
Yet never the promise fulfil!
Storm and sunshine visit the earth,
The seasons expectant roll,
And bring peace and plenty to all,
All save the poor waiting soul.

Years sadden the fair, patient face,
Weary the gentle blue eyes
Grow with their watching and waiting,
For one who never arrives.
At length comes the welcome message,
She meekly bows 'neath the rod,
Death claims her one of his victims,
Her waiting soul is with God.

As a letter of condolence, the following has been offered for a model: "I have heard of your great grief and I send you a simple pressure of the hand."

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER XIX.

"When this letter is given to you, my child, you will be about to enter upon a new, untried life; and that you may not forget your mother then I have written these lines—written them with such loving thought of you, my daughter, and with such earnest prayer for your happiness and welfare, that, even if they sadden you a little, you must not mind now.

"What I am going to write here for your perusal is the story of my life—a story which more than once lately, dear, as I feel my health failing, I have been tempted to tell you. Not that I want to sadden you by telling you that my life is drawing to a close—my poor children. If I could save you that pain I would gladly live, even though life is such a dreary thing now—but I think you ought to know my story, Shirley. When I am gone to meet your father once more—Heaven is so merciful that I dare look forward to that—you will live in Scotland, the country I once loved so dearly, but which I shall never see again, for it has been very cruel to me, my child. Perhaps, after all, it will be well that you should not know this story of mine until you are on the eve of marriage. I think, Shirley, and I hope with all sincerity and fervor, that you will never marry a man you do not love. Surely I have given you such notions of truth and honor as will preserve you from the sin and the shame of a loveless marriage! If you do not love the man you are going to marry, my daughter, it will not be too late to retract even at the last moment; it will be better to suffer any blame than to go a step further on the road which must inevitably lead to sorrow and misery, and perhaps to sin and dishonor.

"But, if, as I hope, my child, you love the man to whom you are betrothed, it will help you to be gentle and lenient and merciful to the poor erring mother who has loved you with a love which ought, with all her faults, to induce you to think of her kindly. I should have liked to tell you the story, to have seen the pitying love on your face; but, if that pity and that love did not show themselves there, how could I have borne it? So perhaps it is better as it is.

"You know the earlier part of my history, Shirley; you know that I was an only and petted daughter and a spoiled and indulged sister. I lost my father and mother while I was still a child, but your uncle, who was some years my senior, filled the place of those dear parents with such a tenderness that I missed them but little. He indulged me in every whim, he gave me my own way in everything; and I grew up proud, willful, and heedless of everything but my own pleasure.

"I was beautiful—you too, my child, possess that fatal dowry of beauty; but I trust it will bring you only happiness. It is a great and precious gift if used aright, and gives the possessor a great power and influence for good or evil. I used my power for evil, Shirley; I employed my beauty as a snare to win hearts and toy with them as long as it pleased my fancy; then I cast them aside, careless whether the wounds I inflicted were serious or not. Flirtation is not looked upon as a sin in the time in which we live, Shirley; but I pray Heaven, my child, that you will be kept from such unwomanly shame.

"Among my admirers was a gentleman some ten or fifteen years my senior, whose suit my brother favored strongly. Sir Henry Proctor was a man of large property and distinguished family; he was, moreover, very handsome and agreeable; and he loved me—yes, he loved me. But there are so many different kinds of love, my darling, that it is difficult to know which is the true kind. This was true, so far as it went; but he preferred his happiness to mine, and true love does not do that.

"I was proud of my conquest, one which others had attempted in vain; but I did not love Sir Henry Proctor, whom I had known three months when your father, Shirley, came to Dumfife, and Gilbert invited him to Fairholme. He was very gentle to me, but very cold; he disapproved of my conduct, and reproved me more than once; but I loved him with all my heart and soul and strength. I loved him; and there was no woman on earth so happy as I when, one day, a danger to which I was exposed, and from which he rescued me, forced him to betray the love for me which he had hitherto kept concealed, because he was not wealthy enough to aspire to Miss Fairholme. Ah, how happy I was!

"My brother did not receive the news of our attachment very cordially. Mr. Ross was not rich, and his profession was seriously against him, in Gilbert's opinion. Still, when he saw that my happiness was involved, he consented to an engagement between us; but we were not to be married until I was twenty-one—a condition to which we both agreed willingly. Shortly afterward Roland went to Rome to continue the study of the art he loved.

"I missed him greatly, for I loved him with my whole heart; but my love did not prevent me from continuing my flirtation with Sir Henry Proctor. My engagement, the news of which he had received very calmly, did not seem to trouble him at all; he was just as devoted as ever, but he did not put his devotion into words, and so I was off my guard. I thought he was willing to look upon me as a friend. He often met me in my rides and walks, and he was a most agreeable companion.

"One day—ah, how clearly I remembered all its details afterward, although they made so little impression upon me at the time—we were riding at some distance from Fairholme. I was unattended, for I rarely rode with a groom, but Sir Henry's servant was with him. A sudden and violent storm came on, which frightened the horses and compelled us to seek shelter. We found it in a wayside inn where they were able to accommodate the horses, and Sir Henry and myself were glad to dry our clothes by the kitchen fire. We were laughing and chatting merrily over the mishap, when the innkeeper's wife came in to ask if we would take any refreshment. Sir Henry answered at once, 'Yes; my wife would like some tea, if you please.' 'And what will you take, sir?' 'Some toddy,' he answered laughing; then, when she had left us, he turned to me, merrily asking how I liked the position I had assumed—or rather which he had given to me—as his wife.

"We were very merry over it; and, when the woman came back, Sir Henry spoke frequently of his wife, and I laughed and coquetted and called him my husband, and told the landlady that we had not been married long, and said many other foolish things, I dare say. Sir Henry said laughingly that I had been engaged to some one else, but that I perferred him; so I had thrown the other fellow over and had married him. And the landlady laughed too, and said she did not wonder, for Sir Henry was handsome enough to make any girl false. And all this time Sir Henry's groom was standing in the kitchen, at a distance from us, but where every word reached him distinctly.

"Well, the storm ceased, and we rode away, and I thought no more of our adventure. Sir Henry came daily to Fairholme—and he was too agreeable and pleasant not to be missed if he did not come—and the months passed on until I was approaching my twenty-first birthday; and I began to look forward to Roland's return.

"But one day—oh, Shirley, shall I ever forget the day?"

Shirley had been reading attentively and without a pause for some time when she reached this part of her mother's narrative, and during the last few minutes she had grown terribly pale, and an expression of intense horror was creeping slowly into her wide dilated eyes. Now she stopped, pushing the sheets of paper from her with a quick passionate movement; and, as she rose from her chair, the letter fell fluttering down at her feet. She did not heed the falling sheets as she moved away from the fire, pushing back her hair from her face with a wild troubled gesture almost of despair. She did not know what horror had come upon her; she was trembling from head to foot in an undefined agony of fear, her breath was coming in quick gasps of terror, and the throbbing of her heart might almost have been heard in the stillness of the room. For a few moments this terror held her, then it passed away, and she forced her stiff livid lips to smile at the pale horror stricken face she saw in the looking-glass as she passed on her way back to the fire.

She stooped, lifted, with little remorseful tender fingers, the fallen sheets and smoothed them out, pressing them, with a passionate revulsion of feeling, to her lips; then, still trembling a little and very pale, she sat down and recommenced to read.

"But one day—on, Shirley, shall I ever forget the day?—your uncle came into the room where I was writing to Roland, and, with a sternness he had never shown to me before, handed me a letter from Sir Henry Proctor, claiming me as his wife. I remember how I laughed, and said gayly that Sir Henry must have taken leave of his senses; but Gilbert's gravity never changed. He sat down and desired me to tell him all that had happened at the inn. I made light of it; but he interrupted me. 'Marian,' he said sternly, 'this is no jesting matter. In this country there are marriages called irregular marriages which are as binding in law as any others. Persons with no intention of marriage may become married, even when they do not know that they are legally held to be so. If the facts are as Sir Henry Proctor has stated them in his letter, there may be the greatest difficulty in proving that you are not his wife.' I looked at him in surprise, with a feeling of intense horror creeping over me. 'May I see the letter?' I said steadily; and, when he gave it to me, I was able to read it calmly, and to acknowledge that Sir Henry had merely related what had occurred at the inn where we had sheltered during the storm. But I could not believe, even when Gilbert assured me of it, that that could possibly constitute a marriage. Of course legal assistance was sought immediately, and the eminent lawyers whom my brother consulted gave conflicting opinions. One said that I was Sir Henry's wife, another that it was no marriage; but I saw the danger to which I had exposed myself. Heaven only knows how I suffered during that terrible time! Of course Roland had to be told; and, as soon as he came to Fairholme, Sir Henry pressed his claims upon me, and all my entreaties were in vain. At first Gilbert, anxious to avoid scandal, entirely refused to have the case referred to the law courts; but my passionate pleading—I threw myself at his feet, Shirley, until he consented—at last succeeded. Shall I tell you the result, my daughter? A few words spoken in jest at a wayside inn in the presence of witnesses made me the wife of a man whom I never loved, but whom now I abhorred. I was Sir Henry Proctor's wife. It was no matter that I had not given my consent, that I was ignorant of the abominable marriage-law in force in the country I loved so dearly; I was his wedded wife. I think they believed that I had been a consenting party, and that I was willing then to accept a richer suitor than Roland Ross, and that I had consented to this irregular marriage to avoid the blame which a jilt justly incurs. But, be that as it may, I was his wife. A long period of darkness followed, Shirley. I was very ill—sick unto death and I was no better when I went home to Sir Henry's magnificent estate—a wife who hated her husband, who despised him for the treachery that had caused her misery, who loved another man with all her heart.

"Shirley, how can I tell you the rest? How can a mother confess to her child what will perhaps make her despise her and hate her for the shame she has brought upon her name? How can I tell you how my endurance failed under the misery and wretchedness which were my constant companions? My health gave way; a terror of death without ever seeing Roland again came over me. I struggled against it in vain. I could not feel that I was married in the sight of heaven; and one day I left Sir Henry's house and travelled day and night to Rome, where I knew Roland was. I remember seeing his agitated, startled, rapturous face; then consciousness left me.

"When my senses came back, I was lying in a strange room, with a strange nurse bending over me. I had been ill many days, she told me, but she would not answer any questions—only soothe me to sleep; and I was too weak to be very curious, or to feel anything deeply. But, as days went on, my strength came back, and with it my recollection; and I suffered an agony of distress when I thought of the shame I had brought upon a name hitherto honored and unstained, and that I myself had sunk to the lowest level and was worthy only of contempt. I was almost quite strong again when I saw Roland; and the sight of his pitying compassionate face, so altered and sorrowful, almost broke my heart, and I longed to die. But I was well enough to hear the news which he brought me; and he told me in his grave tender voice that I was free now—that Death had freed me. Sir Henry Proctor, on his way to Rome in pursuit of me, had been one of the victims of a terrible railway accident in the south of France.

"You know the rest. Your father loved me enough to share my shame and misery, and we were married. With what intense love, what heartfelt humility, I became his wife you cannot guess, my child; how earnestly I prayed for his happiness is known only to the Hearer of Prayer and my own heart. That he was happy I believe, and I think I helped to make him so. But of his goodness, his patience, his unfailing love for the erring woman he had made his wife I cannot speak, even to you. You were not too young when you lost him to appreciate his nobility, and, my child, that you will always revere his memory is my truest wish.

"And now, my darling, I must cease. I am very weary, and I have told you all. Forgive your mother, Shirley, and think kindly of her, if you can. She has sinned much, but she has suffered; for all the love and peace of so many years of her life have not blotted out her regret for the irrevocable past. May such love be yours, my daughter, but not such regret! Heaven forever bless you, Shirley!"

That was the end; the piteous confession was finished, the last words were read; and Shirley's hazel eyes were raised slowly from the pages over which she bent. For a moment she stared straight in front of her with wide unseeing eyes, then the white lids sunk, a ghastly pallor overspread the lovely face, and all grew dark as she fell back in a merciful unconsciousness.

CHAPTER XX.

"My dear Shirley," said Ruby Capel's gay voice, as her bright brunette face appeared at the door of Shirley's room the next morning, "this is not at all en regle. You ought not to have ventured to get up until you had had some tea; and of course you are not thinking of venturing down stairs?"

Shirley, who had been standing at the window in her long crimson dressing-gown, with her pretty chestnut hair falling around her, turned round, smiling, to answer her friend's gay greeting.

"Of course I am not going to venture down stairs," she said lightly. "I have some slight regard les convenances, Ruby, and—"

"The very idea of a bride making her appearance before she is dressed in all her bridal finery is enough to make Mrs. Grundy expire!" cried Ruby gayly.

"Then, if it would have such a very desirable effect, Ruby, I had better go down at once."

"She would expire only for five minutes," said Ruby resignedly. "She is a regular headed monster, and there is no killing her. It must have been a terrible shock to her to think that Major Stuart slept in the house last night. That is quite contrary to etiquette. Really I am so au fait that you might very well imagine that I had been married myself."

While she chatted gayly she had placed on the table the little tray she had carried into the room; then she went to Shirley's side and stood on tiptoe to kiss her, for Shirley was much taller than the little "pocket Venus" with whom Captain Fairholme was so smitten.

"Come and have some breakfast, Shirley, my bonny bride," she said fondly. "You look awfully pale, my dear, to-day. Have you had a bad night?"

"I did not sleep much," Shirley answered, smiling. "But I am very well; and I am sure it is the correct thing for brides to be pale, Ruby."

"Yes, but you have such dark shadows under your eyes, dear. Never mind—you look most lovely," she added softly; and Shirley returned her kiss with passionate fondness as she went over to the table to pour out the tea.

"Alice is not stirring yet," Ruby said merrily. "She does not intend to put in an appearance until she comes to assist you with your toilet. She says getting up early is a mistake on an occasion of this kind. The men are wandering about as if they were lost, or had strayed," she went on, laughing. "I have just sent Os— Captain Fairholme to take them into the billiard-room, or they will get desperate. Men are such helpless mortals on an occasion like the present."

"Certainly, women take more naturally to it," said Shirley languidly, drinking her tea feverishly, but not tasting any of the dainty breakfast which Ruby had brought her. "Who is it, Ruby, who says that all women seem to be in their natural element at a wedding, and all the men to be out of it?"

"Some one who has studied human nature," answered Ruby, laughing. "Come, Shirley dear, do eat something. We shall have you fainting by and by and frightening poor Guy out of his senses."

"You need not be at all afraid," Shirley said laughingly. "I am not given to fainting, and no such catastrophe will happen. Even if it did, Guy would not be frightened out of his senses."

"You think not? Well, I think the reverse. And swooning brides may be very interesting in a novel, but they are very tiresome in real life," said Ruby gayly. "I have brought up your diamonds, Shirley. How superb you will be!"

"I wish that Sir Jasper had not desired that I should be married in his beautiful gift," Shirley remarked languidly. "I perfer a bride, especially a dowerless bride like me, to wear no jewels. What are you gazing at so steadfastly, Ruby?"

"At a mounted messenger riding in hot haste up the avenue," said Ruby carelessly. "A telegram, I suppose."

She did not turn away from the window, or she would have seen the awful look of terror which crossed Shirley's face and the deathly pallor which stole into her lips. But Miss Ross conquered her emotion by an effort, and there was a short silence, during which Ruby admired the diamonds glittering on their satin bed, and Shirley sat still and calm outwardly, but full of a terrible anxiety. Then Ruby flittered away to don her pretty bridesmaid dress, and Shirley sat waiting for the bridesmaid to come and dress her, the color coming back slowly into her cheeks as the time slipped by and no unusual commotion was to be heard.

"After all," Shirley thought, as she leant her head upon the cushions and forced a smile to her lips, "my fears are groundless. Sir Hugh never meant that—he could not be so treacherous and so base. It would be too cruel to wait till now. Even if he knows the law, he does not care. I am so absurdly nervous. A breath of fresh air will do me good."

She went to the window, opened it, and leaned out. It was a fine sunshiny morning, although a good deal of snow had fallen during the night—bitterly cold, but seasonable—a fair day for a wedding-day, Shirley thought, if the proverb held good that "happy is the bride the sun shines on." The view from the window was very beautiful; all the skeleton trees in the park were clothed with a fair spotless mantle, which glittered in the sun. Two of the maid-servants were hurrying along the terrace under the window, laughingly comparing the valentines which the post had brought them. They looked bright and busy and smiling in their pretty new gray dresses and smart white-ribboned caps, and their gay pleasant voices reached Shirley's ears as she leaned at the window above, letting the cold fresh air blow on her hot brow and bring a faint color into her fair face.

She felt weary and languid, and the chill reviving breeze was pleasant to her; she had not slept all night, and the heavy shadows under the lovely hazel eyes testified to the long vigil. Her faint had been but short; she had returned to life and consciousness to find the fire dying out and her mother's letter still open upon her lap; and for the first few moments her agony of mind had been unendurable and indescribable, but then her calmer reason had reasserted itself, and she told herself that Sir Hugh had not meant anything when he called her his wife. Had he done so, he would not have delayed until now, he would not have gone away without a word or sign. Yet all through the night hours the thought had haunted her with a persistency which she could not dismiss, and the gray winter dawn had found her lying wakeful and wide-eyed upon the pillow.

Rain and Railroads.

"But clearing off the land prevents rainfall."

A New York Mail and Express scientist was discussing this problem with a tourist who has recently returned from a scientific jaunt into South America.

"That may be so," returned the latter, "but it is a meteorological fact that the laying of railroad tracks in certain countries produces rain. Take Mexico, for instance. Recent serious damage done by washouts on the northern section of the Mexican Central Road was due to waterspouts bursting on the track, and it is a curious fact that waterspouts seem to be attracted by the iron track and telegraph wires.

"Not only that," continued the tourist. "But the engineers on the line of the Guadalajara branch of the Mexican Central Railway have noted that as fast as the construction advances rain follows, and they hold that this is due to the large quantity of steel rails on flat cars, which are carried forward as fast as the work of construction permits. The most noticeable fact is that the country is dry in advance of the construction trains, and also behind them, for a number of miles. Rains beat down, as described, in bucketfuls, just where the steel rails are, but only in circles a few miles in diameter."

"How true this theory is," added the traveller in conclusion, "I don't pretend to say, but the fact remains, and up to date it has not been explained."

Humors of the Jury.

"I remember," says Lord Eldon, "Mr. Justice Gould trying a case at York, and when he had proceeded for about two hours he observed, 'Here are only eleven jurymen in the box; where is the twelfth?' 'Please you, my lord,' said one of the eleven, 'he has gone away about some business; but he has left his verdict with me.'" This is almost on a par with a case tried in one of the Lancashire courts, when Sergeant Cross was a resident barrister in that county. The jury having consulted and agreed upon their verdict, were addressed by the clerk of the peace: "How say you, gentlemen of the jury, do you find for the plaintiff or the defendant?" "What sayn yo? I dunnot understand," said the foreman. "Why, as you have decided, all I want to know is, whether your verdict is for the plaintiff or the defendant?" The foreman was still greatly embarrassed; but he replied, "Whoy, I raly dunnot know, but we're for him as Mester Cross is for!"

The Artist Tells Her His Secret.

Lady—"I like your pictures so much, and I would dearly love to be an artist. Won't you tell me the secret how to do it?"

Artist—"Most willingly, madam. You have only to select the right colors and put them on the right place."

"Oh, thanks, awfully. I shall go home now and commence right away."

A Poor Rule That Won't Work Both Ways

Mother—Johnny, did you ask your employer if you might get off to-day?

Son—No, the boss never speaks to be about it when he goes.—From Judge.

In an interview between Henry M. Stanley and a newspaper correspondent, the distinguished explorer said: "I have been in Africa seventeen years, and I have never met a man who would kill me if I folded my hands."

—Rev. Dr. Smith, ex-Moderator of Presbyterian Church in Canada, now in California, has decided to accept a call from St. John's Church, San Francisco. He is expected to preach his farewell sermon in Galt about the second Sunday in April.

Mr. Daniel Collins, a well-known resident of London West, fell down a stairway at the Boswell House, King street, on Thursday evening, sustaining severe injuries.

Alexander Arnold, otherwise known as "Old Aleck," who has just been released from the penitentiary at Joliet, Ill., is probably as accomplished a horse-thief as there is in the country. During the thirty years of his criminal career he is known to have stolen more than 300 horses, including some valuable Kentucky thoroughbreds, and he has served his time in half a dozen penitentiaries.

LOVE AT LAST.

"Why will you not give up this mad scheme of becoming a public singer? You know I love you, Daisy, and in two years I shall come into my fortune. Until then we can manage to get along if you marry me."

"I cannot break up the plans your family have made for you. You must go abroad and study as arranged. If, when you return——"

"Never!" he said, savagely. "Choose between me and this profession!"

"I have chosen," she said, with dignity, and so Francis Mayburn left his cousin, Daisy Stanley, feeling very angry at her determination. Two years afterwards they met again. She was with his uncle, Col. Mays, whom he had not seen in year Mrs. Mays introduced them. Dr. Mayburn offers his hand, but Daisy does not see it.

She was looking past him at Fred Mays, who was elbowing his way to Miss Stanley's side. Mrs. Mays brought her to consciousness, however, by saying:

"Daisy, my dear, do you not see Dr. Mayburn's hand?"

Then she laid her fingers in his, coldly, as any stranger might have done.

That night at the hall, as she came down to dinner, she caught sight of Dr. Mayburn in the drawing-room with a kid glove in his hands. He thrust it hastily in his pocket on seeing her.

"So you found my kid glove," she said, indifferently. "Thank you." And she reached out her hand for it. But Dr. Mayburn, instead of giving the glove, said:

"Will you not allow me to keep it, Daisy?" The name was pronounced, oh, so tenderly.

She opened her dark, dreamy eyes in astonishment, and speaking in the third person, replied: "Dr. Mayburn is mistaken in Miss Stanley. In all the years of her public life," and she emplasized the word public, "no gentleman ever before dared to take such a liberty."

He put the glove silently into her hand.

"Forgive me," he said, kindly; "I see I have no longer any right to ask a favor of you."

Just then Rose Mays and three or four other young girls came dancing into the room and the conversation was broken off. Presently the gentlemen followed and dinner was announced. Col. Mays took Daisy out, as his favorite, and placed her at his right hand. Dr. Mayburn led out Mrs. Mays, and the rest followed in order. After dinner others came in, a score and more, all young, and there was a dance and then a supper, and the merry party was kept up till the small hours of the morning.

In all that time Dr. Mayburn had little or no chance to talk to Daisy again, so surrounded was she with admirers. He could dance with Rose Mays or anybody but Daisy. She was always engaged.

Noticing this at last, good Mrs. Mays interfered and said, half laughingly, half earnestly:

"It isn't fair, gentlemen, for you to monopolize Miss Stanley. Dr. Mayburn has tried in vain to dance just one set with her. Some of you ought to give way to him, as he is a stranger."

"Oh, never mind my wishes, Mrs. Mays. It doesn't matter in the least," the doctor interposed, embarrassed, and hardly knowing what he said.

Daisy overheard him, however.

"Of course not, doctor," she replied, coolly. "Yet we all commend your self-sacrificing spirit and laudable ambition in asking to dance with a public singer."

It was an ill-bred thing to say, and Miss Stanley knew it. But she meant to shock Dr. Mayburn. The past was very vivid in her mind to-night, just as it was in his, and she meant to be revenged. Fred whirled her away in a mazy waltz, and the doctor stood back, gnawing his mustache in undisguised chagrin.

But only for a moment. Concealing his mortification under a gay smile, he led Rose Mays out, and they, too, were soon going round and round in perfect time to the throbbing, sorrowful sweetness of "The Beautiful Blue Danube."

Daisy saw it, and a new feeling came over her, a feeling of angry pain, the pain of jealousy.

"After all, he doesn't care," she thought, wearily. "He despises me because I have worked for a livelihood." For, you see, she loved Dr. Mayburn as fervently as ever.

She felt she would break down if she remained. There was a little boudoir quite at the other end of the house, where she knew she would be undisturbed, and thither she fled for refuge. A large bay window almost filled up one end of this apartment. It was a beautiful moonlight night, and, the curtains being drawn, the little room was flooded with effulgence. Daisy knelt down on a rug, and, leaning on the seat, looked out. "Oh," she thought, "what perfect peace is there! If I could only be like that." Her golden hair glittered in the moonlight and her dark eyes were full of appealing pathos.

Tears came. She almost broke down. She wiped the tears from her eyes resolutely, however. "Oh, pitiless, pitiless moon, cold and unsympathizing!" she cried. "Do you ever heed the griefs you witness, the hearts that break before you?"

A step made her start. She recognized it at once and sprang to her feet.

"Daisy," said a voice, full of emotion, beside her, "after all these years will you not forgive me? Have you no pity? Overlook what the prejudiced boy said. Be at least just to the repentant man."

She looked at him, half incredulously for a moment. The next she was in his arms.

A Cyclone in Thorold.

Yesterday, while business was proceeding in its usual course at McCleary & McLean's mills, a whirlwind suddenly picked up a dozen inch boards, fourteen and sixteen inches wide, from a pile, carried them fully forty feet, and dashed them against the side of the planing-mill, some of them entering a window, which was torn entirely out, not a bar remaining. —Thorold Post.

Professor Rogers, of Washington, has just mathematically proved that the dynamic power of a pound of good steam coal is equivalent to the work of one man for a day, that three tons will represent his labor for twenty years, and that one square mile of a four-foot steam will effect as much as one million men can do in twenty years.

A HUMAN MAGNET.

An Infant Child to Whose Finger Tips Articles of Metal Adhere.

Late in August last, while taking a vacation in a country town, I heard of a case that was causing considerable discussion and wonderment among the people. Lovers of the mysterious, who are always ready to attribute any manifestation at all peculiar to supernatural agencies, were indulging in various wise speculations as to the true nature of the case. The child is termed a "human magnet" by the believers in and practisers of magnetic rubbings, while the Spiritualists declare the child a chosen medium. My curiosity became aroused and I asked permission to see this wonderful prodigy. Permission was granted and I saw the child at two different times, making my visits some days apart. I found a pretty, delicate child, Dolly C., aged three and one-half years, an only child, blonde, with a pale and rather waxy complexion. Her manner of speech and conduct were characterized by a womanly grace much in advance of her tender years. Last February the phenomenon I described was first noticed. While playing with some spoons the mother was surprised to see her arranging them on her finger tips, where they hung with perfect ease. She will place the palmar surface of the finger tips in the concavity of the spoon-bowl near the end, and lift from the holder, one by one, without otherwise touching them, until a spoon is suspended from each finger tip. If the spoons do not strike too violently against each other she will carry them about the room without dropping them. The spoons will adhere to the nose and chin as they do on the fingers. I examined the case in various ways. First I tried four teaspoons with a magnet; one pure silver, one pewter, one triple plated and one single plated or washed. The pure silver or pewter spoons were not influenced by the magnet; the heavier plated was only partially raised, while the washed spoon was raised entirely clear of the table. I carried these four spoons with me, for the child to exercise her anomalous power of prehension upon. Each one was suspended with equal ease exeept the one of pure silver. This one was lighest in weight, and the bowl was considerably flatter than any of the other three. But after arranging it upon her finger a few times she succeeded in making it "stick." Asking her to put two fingers under the spoon-bowls, I found a very appreciable resistance in taking it off. The spoons would hang from the tip of the nose and chin with as much security as from the fingers. Thinking the adherence might be due to an excessive clamminess of the skin I tested its surface with my own finger tips. Not discovering any, and to make sure I was not deceived by my own sense of touch, I had the hands, nose and chin carefully washed with soap and water and dried with a warm towel. I found no perceivable difference in the adhesiveness. The child could not pick up a steel needle, that is so sensitive to the magnet, nor would a penny "stick" to the fingers, chin or nose. I could discover nothing unusual in the shape of the finger tips. The skin was soft and velvety to the touch and I could be sure of clamminess nowhere except on the pinna. The hands and feet were warm to the touch when I saw her, and her mother states that she is not often troubled with cold feet or hands. The little patient's mother also told me that her sister's daughter, a young lady of 19 years of age and "always sick," as she expressed it, manifests the same singular power. This case I did not see, but have no reason to doubt the lady's statement, as she and her whole family are known to be truthful and honest. I have been thus particular in giving all the available points in the family history of the case, hoping thereby some light might be thrown upon the singular phenomenon.—Dr. E. H. Root in the Medical Reporter.

A Remedy for Burns.

Many remedies at one time or another have been proposed for the surgical condition following the application of excessive heat to the body, and, while some of these are of value, still all are more or less unsatisfactory. The alleviation of the pain and suffering attendant upon burns is one of the most important points in the case toward which the surgeon directs his efforts. The shock from this cause alone is sufficient often times to produce death, and always is great. Accidentally I recently discovered a remedy which is easily applied and exceedingly prompt in its action. I was called in some haste to a little child, about three weeks ago, who was badly burned about the hands and face, from falling on a hot stove. The burns were deep, the pain excessive and the shock very considerable. I sent to the drug store for a mixture of lime water, olive oil and carbolic acid. While waiting for this, I prepared to give the child a hypodermic injection of morphine, with which to allay the agony, which was so great that convulsions seemed imminent. While I was getting ready to do this, I espied upon the shelf a bottle of pinus canadensis (colorless). Remembering its wonderful soothing influence in acute inflammation, I at once concluded to try it. Taking a corner of a soft handkerchief, I rapidly painted the injured parts, when, like magic, the pain ceased. You can well imagine my surprise and delight at the result. I directed a camel's hair brush to be purchased, and had the mother make free applications, and the case had no more treatment, save a little iodoform ointment later on. Since this I have tried it in several cases, both slight and severe, and with the same delightful results.—N. Y. Medical Journal.

The Los Angeles real estate boom has collapsed and the boomers are sawing wood and doing other odd jobs. Several thousand promising sub-divisions have relapsed into a state of pastoral quietness. When the crop of mortgages is harvested the land will be planted in potatoes, as usual.

EGYPTIAN SLAVE GIRLS.

Comparing Them With English Drudges —Circassian Maidservants Said to Lead Pleasanter Lives Than Their More Highly Civilized Sisters.

The English drudge rises early and goes to bed late, working eight or twelve hours a day, either in her miserable garret or in a huge manufacturing hive. Pinched with hunger and cold, worn out with labor, exposed to temptation and degradation, her joyless life stretches behind her and before her, with no pleasures to look back upon, no hope to look forward to. The wages she earns, those wages which proudly separates her from the slave, are barely sufficient to keep body and soul together, till at last the body gives way or the soul revolts. Then comes the inevitable end, and a verdict of "Death from starvation" or "Found drowned" closes the scene.

The Soudani girl is taken from her parental hut of sticks and mud and sold to a respectable family or perhaps a very rich one. In the first case, she will probably be alone; in the second, she will find others like herself. She represents so much capital invested, and is looked after with equivalent care. She is a servant whose wages have been paid twenty years in advance. It is true they have not been paid to her, but that is all the better for the girl. She is well housed and well fed, and wants for nothing. She is immediately provided with decent clothes and set to house-work. She has charge of the family washing and cleaning, and of the kitchen, and generally fulfills these duties much better than a native paid servant would do. She is under no special restraint, accompanies her mistress shopping or does the marketing herself, and gossips her till with the neighbors as she hangs out the linen on the house top, or sweeps the door step.

Her work is by no means hard, and after the fashion of Egypt, where every man is a brother and every woman a sister, she is looked upon by the family quite as one of themselves. Speaking from personal observation, we may affirm that the black women are almost invariably treated with the utmost kindness and indulgence, and are often spoiled like children by the too great good nature of their masters or mistresses. They constitute a very merry, happy portion of the population, and it is seldom one can find a black girl without an infectious broad grin on her polished face. If she chooses to marry, as she often does, with her owner's consent, she receives a dower, and goes forth a "free" woman in the letter, though often, as she finds to her cost, a greater bond slave in the spirit than in the days of her servitude.

Now let us go a step higher in the social scale, and place the middle class English girl, compelled to work for her living, side by side with the Circassian, and we shall find again that all material advantages, of which alone we speak, are not on the side of the free. The Circassian is a little fair haired lass from a far village in Turkestan (pace Dr. Tanner). Her father is a robber or a herdsman, and she will perhaps be a princess. The Prince Charming, whom the governess is always looking for, but who never comes, is a very strong potentiality in the future of the white slave girl. One day a bearded and venerable old Turk arrives from Stamboul, and picks out our little girl. She is not carried away by force, but gold is counted out, and she is perched on a mule, and bids good-by forever to barbarism. The purchaser takes every imaginable pains with her education and appearance. She is taught to read and write, to dance and sing, to embroider in silk and play the guitar, and further initiated into all the mysteries of the toilet. When she has grown into budding womanhood the dealer lets his best customers know that he possesses a treasure almost priceless, and all her virtues and beauties are detailed with the usual Oriental exaggeration. Finally, some royal princess or rich pasha's wife expresses a wish to see her, and extra care having been taken with her bath and dress she is presented for inspection. She gives samples of her accomplishments, musical, gymnastic and otherwise. Accepted, she is at once clothed with a rich silk dress, and receives a present of a necklace or bracelet as an earnest of favor before she joins her fellow slaves. Beyond assisting her mistress in the toilet, accompanying her in her drives, and handing her coffee and cigarettes, she has little to do. She is an ornamental appendage rather than a servant. A household such as one of these Circassians would enter would contain a crowd of men servants and black women to do the work, and perhaps ten to twenty other girls like herself, and a very gay time they have together. The great ladies are very fond of exchanging visits and giving musical entertainments, at all of which some of the slave girls attend. When she goes out with her mistress in the natty little brougham, almost the only difference between the lady and the maid lies in the former taking the right hand seat. The girl is dressed in a way to do credit to the house she belongs to, and often sparkles with jewels, chatting freely with everybody at the places she visits, and enjoying herself as fully as any of the emancipated. When the time comes for her to be married, her owner chooses a suitable husband and gives a rich dower, and many of the marriages of slave girls eclipse in magnificence those of even the wealthier classes. The erstwhile barefooted, ragged little Circassian from Turcoman's Land is now a princess or pasha's wife, with slaves of her own; but she would laugh if you suggested to her that there was anything degrading in their position or had been in her own.—London Saturday Review.

Slightly off the Key

"In regard to what I shall eat," observed the Boston young lady, pleasantly, yet with dignity, as she regarded the dish before her, "I never take anybody's ipse dixit."

"I told you, James," said the embarrassed hostess, a St. Louis lady, "that Miss Howjames wasn't ready for mince pie yet."

To a request of the eloquent Dr. Hawks for an increase of salary, giving as his reason that his family expenses were increasing, an officer of the church replied: "Do not trouble yourself, the Lord has promised that He will care for the young ravens when they cry." "I know that," said the witty minister, "but nothing is said about he young Hawks."

NEW COIFFURE.

Graceful Style of Hair Dressing Named after Mrs. Cleveland.

There has been so little variety in the way of coiffure during late years that hair dressing in an artistic sense has very nearly become a lost art, causing the hand of the professional hair dresser to well nigh "lose its cunning," hence the announcement of an innovation introducing new and graceful styles in this essentially important part in the toilet of every lady will be received with more than ordinary interest by our fair readers.

Bangs straight, bangs crimped, under various catching names, bangs in every degree of puffiness or the reverse, from the quiet bit of fringe just touching the forehead, to the heavy, the bristly or otherwise conspicuous, have had a long day and promise in a modified form to continue in favor. But the simply arranged back knot so much in vogue of late, together with the style of cutting off the back hair, is going out, in fact it may be said to have gone out, and in being replaced with a new and by far more elegant form of coiffure.

A woman's "crowning glory is her hair," and since the earliest times the art of dressing the hair has occupied the time, attention and ingenuity of women, a pleasing and gratifying pastime from which they have been debarred during the rather protracted reign of no hair, so to speak, or at most the easily arranged bang and Grecian knot at the back. The new coiffure named in honor of Mrs. Cleveland and which bears her name is the most graceful of the several novelties lately introduced and will beyond all doubt become the most popular. While fulfilling its mission of displaying the hair to the best advantage at the back, it admits of any arrangement of the front hair that may suit the features and the taste of the wearer, and can be worn with any style of hat. This mode consists simply of three strands of long hair curled about four inches at the ends and arranged as follows: Twist all the hair on top of the head almost close to the forehead, place a front piece dressed in loose fluffy rings, or in any style which the wearer may fancy, over the twist so as to raise it high towards the crown, then take one strand of the three into which the long hair must be divided, make into a plain knot and place in the centre so that the curled ends just reach the neck; the other two strands are then twisted loosely in the form of a "rope twist" and wound around the knot in the centre just above the curls near the neck and so shaped as to give a long and narrow effect to the coiffure. The curled or crimped ends of the "rope twisted" strands will by this arrangement be brought to the top of the coiffure and mingle with the curls of the front piece, which completes the head dress. For full dress occasions the Cleveland coiffure is in admirable keeping, as it admits of jewelled pins, aigrette, etc., which are so effective in artificial light, and can be as easily formed with an ordinary switch and a few pin curls as with one's own hair.

The Smallest People of the World.

Prof. Flower, of the London Natural History Museum, recently delivered a lecture on the Akkas, the diminutive tribe of black people in Central Africa, discovered by Schweinfurth in 1870. The Akkas he believes to be the smallest people on earth, their height usually ranging at maturity from 3 feet 10 inches to 4 feet 5½ inches. The types most nearly allied to them are the natives of the Andaman Islands and the bushmen of South Africa. It is possible that the Akkas gave origin to the stories of pigmies so common in the writings of Greek historians, and whose habitations were often placed near the sources of the Nile. The name Akka, by which Schweinfurth says the tribe now call themselves, has singularly enough, been read by Mariette Pasha by the side of the portrait of a dwarf in a monument of the ancient Egyptian Empire.

The Plumber who Stopped a Rat Hole.

A few years ago John M. Dowling built for his own use a handsome three-story and basement residence at 290 Huron street. Winning a ten thousand dollar bet on the presidential election, he put it into a barn, for which he has little use, save as a monument to his good judgment. He then set about filling his house with everything that money could purchase in the way of furniture, and the latest appliances for utilitarian and sanitary purposes, and had just settled down to enjoy life when one day the servant girl reported a rat in the basement. The plumber was sent for and given orders to stop up the rat hole without regard to expense. He did so, and yesterday handed in his bill. It called for $1,333.35. He had found it necessary to completely overhaul and change the sewerage and drainage system of the premises to keep out that rat.—Chicago Times.

Highlanders as Soldiers.

If you depopulate the Highlands, said Scott, where are you to find your Highlander in case of war? The same question is asked by a Highland officer. He says: "For thirty-seven years I have commanded and associated with Highland soldiers. But of them all I never found an equal to the man from the Lewis for a combination of martial aptitude, sublime courage, childlike obedience. In a word, they are mentally as well as physically the finest soldiers I have ever seen in the course of a life which has taken me into all the capitals of the world and some of its hottest campaigns. These are the men for whom expatriation is proposed. "Grander weapons for the defence of a country," says the Highland officer, "God never gave to any rulers."—Edinburgh Evening News.

A Point for Feminine Reformers.

It takes the skins of three seals to make a sealskin sacque and boa. And yet the dear, delightful feminine reformers, who eschew the feathers of our forest songsters on their bonnets, will rob three seals of their comfortable winter coats and leave them shivering in an icy climate that they themselves may go warmly clad.—Buffalo Express.

A Recent Club Set-To.

First club man (heatedly)—All I have to say is that I consider you a puppy. Second ditto (coolly)—If that were the case I could take the first prize at the dog show, and that's more than you can say. First man—How so? Second ditto—You lack the necessary pedigree and breeding.

HARD TIMES FOR CHILDREN.

Parents Who Keep Crying "Don't Do This" and "Don't Do That."

It is as natural to a child to be happy as it is to a fish to swim, says a writer in the March number of "Woman." But for this they need a certain amount of "letting alone." It is a great mistake for parents to hamper their children with foolish restrictions. We pity the little B's, our next door neighbor's children, from the bottom of our heart. There is a picket fence in front of the house and they are scarcely allowed to go near it lest they should climb and hurt themselves. They cannot climb a tree for the same reason. They may not skate or swim or have a gun. The consequence of this training is that their parents have made cowards of them all with the exception of little Bessie, who is the most darling little mischief that ever wore a sun bonnet, and she has learned to be deceitful and plays all her mad pranks well out of sight of her parents' eye. We caught her the other day walking the railing of a bridge that crossed the track of a railroad a hundred feet below. The railing was not a foot wide and she triumphantly told us that she had walked it while the train was passing under. It was enough to make one shudder. Don't fancy your boy is made of glass. Grant a reasonable request and let him feel that when you refuse it is for his own good. Between the Jellybys and the Gradgrinds of life children have a hard time of it. The youngest child needs some sort of agreeable occupation and a certain amount of physical freedom. There is nothing more painful to young people than to feel that life is one dull routine and that "nothing ever happens," as we once heard a disconsolate lad remark.

A HEADSMAN'S EXPERTNESS.

Taking Off a Criminal's "Top" While He Was Playing Nine Pins.

We have observed several wonderful stories of late respecting the skill of the Chinese executioners, who, it is said, can strike off the heads of their victims so skilfully that the poor fellows themselves never discover their loss until a moment or two after they are dead. We recall to mind, however, the story of a German executioner who far surpassed the Chinese in professional dexterity. Upon one occasion it happened that a criminal had a singular itching to play nine pins, and he implored permission to play once more at his favorite game before he died. Then, he said, he would submit to his fate without a murmur. The judge, thinking there could be no harm in humoring him, granted his last prayer, and upon arriving at the place of execution he found everything prepared for the game, the pins being set up and the bowls all ready. He commenced his favorite sport with enthusiasm. After awhile the sheriff, observing that he showed no inclination to desist, made a sign to the executioner to strike the fatal blow while he stooped for a bowl. The executioner did so, but with such exquisite dexterity that the culprit did not notice or feel it. He thought, indeed, that a cold breath of air was blowing on his neck, and drawing himself back with a shrug, his head dropped forward into his hands. He naturally supposed that it was a bowl which he had grasped, and, seizing it firmly, rolled it at the pins. All of them fell, and the head was heard to exclaim, as it rebounded from the farther wall: "Hurrah! I've won the game."—Chambers' ...

A Story of Lord Cockburn.

Lord Cockburn's looks, tones, language and manner were always such as to make one think that he believed every word he said. On one occasion, before he was raised to the bench, when defending a murderer, although he failed to convince the judge, and the jurymen of the innocence of his client, yet he convinced the murderer himself that he was innocent. Sentence of death was pronounced, and the day of execution fixed for, say, the 20th of January. As Lord Cockburn was passing the condemned man, the latter seized him by the gown saying. "I have not got justice, Mr. Cockburn; I have not got justice." To this the advocate coolly replied: "Perhaps not, but you'll get it on the 20th of January."—Chambers Journal.

The Latest Fad in Photographs.

"The girls are having their pictures taken in threes," said a photographer the other day.

"What is that for," I asked.

"Nothing but a whim, an English whim, maybe. The three daughters of the Princess of Wales are pictured on one card, and possibly that started the craze. There are more orders just now for groups of threes than for single pictures. The dear girls pose in the prettiest attitude their hands can be coaxed into, and the latest thing in albums is a collection of these groups. Bunches of buds, they call them three of a kind, is the name that presents itself to me."—From a New York Letter.

The morphia habit among women is much more common in Philadelphia, says the Times of that city, than many suppose. Even in the late severe weather women, young and old, could be seen hurrying to the drug stores and in most cases the only medicine they were after was morphia in its different forms. The most fashionable method of indulgence is by hypodermic injection, and some of the syringes used are gold and silver mounted and both expensive and elaborate.

It kicked past the dashboard and struck young Taylor about the eye and temple knocking him unconscious. Lipsky, became uneasy and set out to search for him. She sent to Mr. Myers', a neighbor, and as he was not there Mr. Myers joined in the search, but it was not until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon that his body was found in the bush. He had fallen a tree and in falling it had knocked down a dead limb which struck the old man on the head, and killing him instantly, as he had not stirred from the position he had fallen in the snow. The deceased was upwards of 70 years of age, and was a quiet respectable farmer.—Chesley Enterprise.

Mar. 28.—The closing meeting, for the season, of the Collegiate's Literary Society was held this evening. The opening glee "Dream the Dream that's Sweetest" was well rendered. The debate was: "Resolved that Canada would be benefitted by being made a Republic." Messrs. McKay and Dobie spoke with much fervor on the affirmative. Mr. McKay said there was too much King-worship and Queen-worship at present and what we should worship was the country's best interests. Mr. Dobie also made laughable allusion to the country paying out so many thousand pounds to keep up Queen Victoria's husband's daughters and daughters' husbands! Messrs. Skene and Jackman spoke on the negative, but their arguments were not sufficient to weaken the points taken by the other side. Decision was granted in favor of the affirm. Miss Lizzie Richardson and Mr. Elijah Jones (son of an Indian Chief) favored the audience with an instrumental duett—Mr. Jones upon his violin, and Miss Lizzie accompanying him with much expression upon the piano. They responded to an encore. The pantomime "The Working family" representing a family engaged in domestic affairs and working to music was highly amusing. They were interrupted by a young gentleman, probably "the black sheep of the flock," who upset everything and all tumbled in a heap on the floor with wash-tub, churn, irons, tables, apples, etc. accompanying them! This was decidedly the best thing on the programme.

Terrible Accident.

On Tuesday afternoon last Bradford Powell was tail-sawing in Bradley's mill, when he met with a serious accident. He was guiding a board along the table, when the saw suddenly came in contact with a large knot and he was thrown forward upon it. The unfortunate young man's right arm was almost cut in two between the elbow and shoulder, the flesh being torn in a most shocking manner. Notwithstanding his terrible mishap, young Powell showed rare presence of mind and courage by making his way to Mr. Bradley's house at once. Drs. Christoe, and Carter were speedily summoned and dressed the mangled limb.

BRIGHT ON CANADA.

Imperial Federation Only an Illusory Dream.

THE DOMINION, THE STATES AND BRITAIN.

A last (Thursday) night's London cable says: Mr. John Bright's speech at the banquet given to Mr. Chamberlain in Birmingham last night is creating a great deal of excitement in political circles, and receives the attention of the principal London papers.

Mr. Bright, who had to propose the toast of "Our Kinsmen Beyond the Sea," said he had never addressed a meeting that was in such entire sympathy with its object. They could honestly congratulate Mr. Chamberlain, and hope that he might on many other occasions render services to his country. He liked the wording of this toast, for he thought that Englishmen had a right to call all people on the other side of the Atlantic "our kinsmen," and that Englishmen were entitled to look upon a man as an enemy to mankind—not merely to their own English-speaking race—who would do anything to excite anger, disorder or dispute between America and Great Britain. There were other questions besides the fisheries question which ought to be considered. For instance, the commerce of America and Canada had built high walls, and had called them "tariffs." These walls prevented freedom in trading. The Canadians wished these barriers to be abolished. That was a very sensible wish, and he was perfectly certain it would be accomplished. His opinion was that, if the economical facts were so strong, there would be a tendency hardly resistible to get over the sentiment that it was better for Canadians to be associated politically with Great Britain than with the United States. He considered Imperial Federation impossible. The scheme was no better than a dream. He would like to ask the advocates of Federation whether the colonies were likely to link themselves with the stupid foreign policy of England, entering into quarrels and wars with peoples 10,000 miles away. He had, however, the strongest belief in the great future of the English colonies, which he hoped would be strengthened by amicable relations with the Mother Country. Might they not hope for the highest and noblest federation—under different Governments, it might be, but united by race sympathy, freedom of industry and communion of interests—a federation of perpetual peace that would lead the world to that better time that all hoped for and believed in, although it might not be permitted their mortal eyes to behold it?

Mr. Bright's speech, which was a most eloquent one, was loudly cheered throughout. His reference to the Commercial Union movement in Canada is regarded as highly significant.

The Daily Telegraph (Independent Conservative) praises Mr. Chamberlain for the business skill which Mr. Gladstone commended him for in Parliament, and says happily there is little chance now of any dispute in the future between England and America being aggravated to the point of war. If a peaceful and an arbitrating spirit does not yet largely prevail in the world, it has at least strongly touched the two great English-speaking communities. If the present protective system continues in America, Mr. Bright believes a strong temptation will be placed in the way of the Canadians to throw in their lot with the States, simply because of the great material advantages which the abolition of the internal tariff would involve. Happily, public opinion in the States seems to be advancing, if not towards absolute free trade, at all events toward a modification of the existing protective system.

The St. James' Gazette (High Conservative) says Mr. Bright spoke in a fashion that seems to show he has neither learned the signs of the times nor marked the lapse of years. In the prospect of a peaceful adjustment of a fruitful source of contest between England and the States, Englishmen see a foreshadowing of a possibility of unspeakable beneficence. No question of commercial interest can bar the way of an equal partnership in the near future. Whatever Mr. Bright thinks, the picture of a great future is not hopeless.

The Pall Mall Gazette (Radical) says Mr. Bright's discourse was far more pernicious treason than any Irish harangues. It is mournful to reflect how inveterate must be the prejudice which blinds Mr. Bright to the obvious teachings of history. His policy is "cut the painter," dismember the empire, turn the colonies adrift, and wreck the fairest chance the world ever had of establishing a world-wide federation of peace.

The Globe (Tory) says the mutual good feeling between America and England is now strong and bids fair to last, but the real cement must be a natural alliance based upon the welfare of both.

The Morning Post (High Tory) says: There is no need of insisting upon Mr. Bright's idiosyncrasies. He appeared as a representative Englishman, and if his goodwill was not quite tempered by discretion, his words will be judicially interpreted in America

BIG BANK STOCK HOLDERS.

The Wealthy Canadians Who Head the List.

A Montreal despatch says: According to the figures published by the Government the following are the largest holders of stocks in Canadian banks:

William C. McDonald	$ 560,000
Robert Anderson	370,000
J. H. R. Molson	230,000
Sir Donald A. Smith	200,400
John Duncan	122,900
Andrew Allan	121,900
George A. Drummond	107,500
G. B. Burland	87,560
Samuel E. Molson	80,590
John Thomas Molson	57,500
John Cassils	55,000

The total paid-up stock of Canadian banks (leaving out the Bank of British North America and Bank of British Columbia, which are owned in the Old Country) is $57,823,950. The eleven Montrealers named above, therefore, own almost exactly one twenty-ninth part of the whole, their united shares being given at $1,998,610.

A carriage containing Miss Margaret and Miss Annie O'Reilly was struck by a train at Providence, R. I., on Saturday evening, and both ladies killed.

THE WOMEN'S CONVENTION

Mrs. Barry's Paper on "What the Knights of Labor are Doing for Women"—Other Interesting Papers Read.

A last (Wednesday) night's Washington despatch says: The morning session of the International Council was devoted to the general subject of industries. Laura M. Johns, President of the Kansas Equal Suffrage Association, presided. The first paper of the session was read by Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, on "Women's Industrial Gains During the Last Half Century." Mrs. A. M. Worden, Worthy Master of Vineland Grange, No. 1, read a paper on the subject of "Women in the Grange." Hulda B. Loud read a paper on "Women in the Knights of Labor."

The next speaker was Lida Barnay Sales, Corresponding Secretary of the Sociological Society of America. Her paper described the work of the society, and discussed the question of co-operation.

The President next introduced Mrs. Leonore M. Barry, organizer of the Knights of Labor. The subject of her paper was, "What the Knights of Labor are Doing for Women." Mrs. Barry spoke with perfect ease and great earnestness and effect, and was frequently interrupted with applause. She said: We are building around our working girls a wall of protection to defend and protect them from the indignities and humiliations to which heretofore they have been subjected. Any condition of society, any environment of society, that prevents a woman or child from cultivating and developing those three elements of which humanity is formed, the moral, physical and mental elements, making them fit subjects to do the work for which those beings were intended by an Almighty God—that state of society is false. There are no better law supporters, no more loyal citizens to the laws of their country and to their country's flag than the organized working men and women of to-day. They do not demand revolution, but they do demand reform. They do not ask it by the power of physical or brute force or strength; they do not ask it by the destruction of life or property; but constitutionally, and by the law-abiding way, present their desires to the law-making bodies of their nation. Only four years ago I became a Knight of Labor. Seven years ago I was left without knowledge of business, without knowledge of work, without knowledge of what the world was, with three fatherless children looking to me for bread. To support these children it became my duty to go out in the army of unemployed, and in one of the largest factories of central New York I went, and for four years and seven months became a factory woman for the support of my little ones. Four years ago this spring I became a Knight of Labor. I joined an assembly of 1,500 women. And let me say to you here that although there was not one amongst them that could boast of more than a minor part of a common school education, yet in that body of women could be found more executive ability, more tact, more shrewdness, more keen calculating power than could be found in twice that number of any body of men. We are instituting co-operative industries throughout the breadth and length of our land. We have co-operative shirt factories in Baltimore and New York conducted solely by women. We have our collar and cuff factories in Waterford, N. Y. We have our co-operative knitting mill at Little Falls, N. Y., and many other industries. I have during my connection with the organization instituted what is known as the Working Women's National Beneficial Fund. This gives women not less than $3 nor more than $5 per week, and in case of death not less than $75 nor more than $100. It gives protection to every woman, whether she be a Knight of Labor or not. For it is the duty—the aim and the object of the Knights of Labor to elevate woman, no matter what her nationality, creed, color or position in life. The Knights of Labor are taking the little girls from the factory, the workshop and the mine, and educating them, because we know that the little child of to-day is the mother of the future. We know that the fireside, the city, the State, the council and the nation are moulded by the hands of the wives and mothers of our children. As these are the children to-day, and as these will be the working women of the future, we demand that they shall be taken from the workshop, factory and mine, and put into the schools to educate and develop them. If there is any one State for which I might make special appeal, it is the monopoly bound State of Pennsylvania, with her hundred and twenty-five thousand children under the age of 15 employed in the workshops, factories and mines.

The session closed with a well received address on "Women as Farmers," by Esther L. Warne.

At the evening session Prof. Rena A. Michaels spoke of "Women as Educators," and contrasted the modes of training educators fifty years ago with those pursued to-day. Laura C. Halloway spoke on "Woman in Journalism." Dr. Sara Hackett Stevenson spoke of "Woman in Medicine." Mrs. Ada Bittenbender, National Superintendent of Legislation in the W. C. T. U., read a paper on "Woman in Law." Rev. Ada C. Bowles spoke of "Woman in the Ministry." Other addresses were made by prominent ladies.

Fitness in Man's Dress.

"Why do you insist on carrying an umbrella in your hand, although there is no apparent sign of rain?" was asked of an Englishman now sojourning in this city, who, nevertheless, has none of the dude element about him. The answer was characteristic of the English inclination toward the fitness of things, even in matters of dress: "Because I wear an overcoat, and I do not think that a mere walking stick or cane belongs to my dress." The same Englishman remarked on the wearing of tall silk hats that "they are not in character with ulster or travelling coats, since one would scarcely choose to spend a long day in a railroad car wearing a tall hat. But in a frock coat or surtout or Prince Albert, then a tall hat becomes a proper finish to the dress, and a round felt or a fur travelling cap is entirely out of place. Similarly one would hardly top off a flannel boating suit with a tall hat."—New York Press "Every Day Talk."

Cornelius Vanderbilt and his wife sailed from New York for Europe on Saturday.

THE LOCOMOTIVE STRIKE.

Tough Fight Between Strikers and Scabs in Chicago—An Arrest and Short Strike.

A last (Thursday) night's Chicago despatch says: The first encounter between the sympathizers of the striking switchmen and the men who have replaced them took place at 4.30 this afternoon, when a "Q" switch engine and its crew attempted to transfer some freight cars to the North-western tracks. A crowd of switchmen of other roads were about the place, and began to jeer at the new men on the "Q" engine. When the train reached Kinzie street and Western avenue it ran off a switch that had been turned, and a number of cars were ditched. The mob then set upon the crew of the train, and the fireman and engineer took to ther heels, getting numerous cuffs as they escaped. The new switchmen followed suit, and were pursued and roughly used by the crowd, which was made up of the toughest kind of citizens. The Pinkerton men, of whom there were six or eight on the train, attempted to protect the trainmen, but the mob set upon them with savage glee and disarmed them in a twinkling. They were powerless, and after making a few efforts to defend themselves took to flight to escape the drubbing they were receiving at the hands of the furious mob. Several of the Pinkerton men were hurt, and one of them is thought to have sustained serious injuries. On the same train was Division Superintendent Besler, of the Burlington road. When the trouble commenced he hurried to the front and some one in the crowd recognized him. The disclosure of his identity was the signal for the mob to fall on him and beat him. The attack came from all sides, and it was only after having been badly used up that he escaped and ran to a switch house, where he locked himself in and escaped further punishment. The riot created great excitement, and the Pinkerton men and officers flocked to the scene. The mob quickly dispersed however, and only one man was arrested. His name is Quirk. Police were ordered to the scene of the disturbance from nearly all the stations. Quirk, who was arrested, was a Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul switchman. His arrest precipitated a strike of 191 switchmen, 28 engineers and 28 firemen on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road.

When it was known that Quirk had been arrested, a crowd followed him to the station-house and endeavored to get him released, but he was locked up. When the crowd realized that their comrade had to remain in the police station the Milwaukee & St. Paul men in their rage decided to strike, and immediately deserted their engines. The whole yard force of switchmen, engineers and firemen, 227 in all, quit work, leaving 28 engines standing on the tracks. It is rumored that the brakesmen of the same road will go out to-night.

Division Superintendent Besler, who took refuge in the switch-house, had both eyes blacked and was very badly bruised up. The fireman and engineer of the train which was attacked were also badly pounded.

It is said that at a meeting of 500 engineers, firemen and switchmen held this afternoon, at which representatives from all the roads were present, it was resolved that a general boycott be declared against Burlington freight on all roads.

The strike came to an end as quickly as it had begun. At 6.30 two officials of the St. Paul company succeeded in having Quirk released on bail, and it was speedily resolved that a resumption of work was the proper course to pursue. By 9 p. m. the men were again at their posts.

ROYALTY AND SPIRIT RAPPING.

The Wildest Story Yet About Queen Victoria and the Mediums.

A Rochester despatch says: Mrs. H. D. Jencken, of this city, formerly Miss Kate Fox, one of the ladies whose name is associated with spiritualism and the "Rochester knockings" of early days, told your correspondent to-day that her sister, Mrs. Margaret Kane, widow of the arctic explorer, had on Thursday last sailed for Glasgow in response to a summons received from Queen Victoria, who wants to consult her in regard to matters beyond the ken of ordinary mortals, but supposed to be visible to spiritual mediums.

Mrs. Jencken said: "I have just returned from New York, where I was visiting my sister before her departure for England. She told me that her visit to Europe was the result of letters she has received lately from the Royal Family, urging her to go over. I saw the invitation. It was signed by a committee of gentlemen, requesting her on behalf of the Queen to visit England. The Queen has lost many friends of late by death, and she is anxious to learn something about them from the other world. They say John Brown is her medium. The letter was worded in the most urgent terms. It said: 'Don't fail to come. I'll trust you with the money.' They sent her money before and she did not go, but they again gave her abundance of money. She told me she had received a large sum. When my sister sailed she told me to go and tell it all to the New York Herald, but I was tired. She sailed for Glasgow, where the committee is to meet her and take her to London."

Laughed Out of a Freak.

A San Francisco despatch says: A great crowd assembled last night at Kalloch's old church to witness the marriage of a spiritualist woman to her alleged affinity in the spirit land. A thousand invitations had been issued during the week and the church was gaudily decorated.

The crowd waited in vain till late for the bride, but she came not, as newspaper ridicule had frightened her away.

It seems the woman belongs to a coterie of cranks who have engaged in all sorts of ridiculous schemes during the past three years. One of her friends was induced last year to deed all his property, amounting to nearly $70,000, to charity and go forth a tramp evangelist preaching in the street.

Lady Randolph Churchill contemplates a visit to the land of her nativity this summer in company with her husband. They will probably go to Newport, where Lord Randolph will hear many reminiscences of his brother, the Duke of Marlborough.

Justice Redfield, a wealthy retired business man residing on the Tons Road, near Florence, N. J., committed suicide on Saturday night. He was 79 years old.

UP IN ARMS AGAINST THE DONS.

Victoria College Students Enraged at the Suspension of Two of Their Number.

A Cobourg despatch says: The students of Victoria University are up in arms against the college dons. Acta Victoriana is a monthly journal published by the literary and theological societies in the interests of the students and alumni of the University. Its contents are contributed by a staff of editors appointed by and responsible to these societies. An article appeared in the March number of Acta discussing the curriculum of the University, suggesting certain changes therein and recommending that the subject of minerals should be relegated to a summer clime.

When the article appeared the College Faculty immediately took cognizance of it, and, summoning Mr. J. F. McLaughlin, editor-in-chief, and Mr. Henry Langford, local editor (son of the well-known Methodist clergyman of that name), demanded that the two editors should make a humble and unconditional apology under pain of suspension.

The students solidly backed their editors in a positive refusal to apologize. The faculty then decided to suspend the offending journalists for the period of one year, and the Chancellor of the University pronounced the decree of excommunication at a great meeting of students in Alumni Hall last evening. As soon as he had finished reading, Messrs. McLaughlin and Langford arose and gave notice of their intention to appeal to the Board of Regents, the court of last resort, against "an unjust and tyrannical sentence." They were greeted with tremendous cheers, the demonstration lasting several minutes and shaking the building with its enthusiasm. After the retirement of the faculty the students organized a mass meeting, at which a resolution was passed, declaring that if their classmates were not reinstated they would apply for certificates of standing and leave the university. Two-thirds of the senior class in arts asserted that they would apply for an ad eundum statem at Toronto or Queen's. According to the provisions of her charter, if Victoria fails to graduate a class in arts each year she forfeits her status as a university. The situation is therefore a critical one.

HIGH LIFE ROMANCE.

A Disinherited Scotch Lord and His Widow's Wooing.

A New York despatch says: It is reported to-night that Lady Drummond, widow of Lord George Essex Montifex Drummond, who died penniless last August, intends to marry Harry Masters, the iron-moulder of Newark, N. J. Since the death of Lord George the widow has been living economically at a boarding-house in Brooklyn. She earned a living for herself and daughter May by sewing. May is heiress to the oldest title and estates in England. She is not yet 8 years old. Several attempts have been made to kidnap her by English emissaries. Masters was a friend of the late lord. Since his death Masters' attention to the widow have been marked. Lord Drummond, when a boy, married beneath his station and incurred the enmity of his relations. He came to this country, struggled for sixteen years to maintain his family as a fisherman, hunter, pressman and salesman. His wife was Miss Eliza Harrison, daughter of a prosperous London wholesale tea merchant.. Their life in America was a battle with want. Lord Drummond was first porter in a commission house, then fisherman and duck-hunter in Long Island, then a sailor before the mast, and packer in a clothing house. His abandonment, education and rough life incapacitated him for better work. He could hardly write his own name. When he died he was living with his wife and little one in a miserable room on the third floor of a Brooklyn tenement-house.

MINE EXPLOSION.

Over One Hundred Miners Entombed—More Than Fifty Killed.

A Kansas City, Mo., despatch says: The following despatch has been received from Rich Hill—About 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon there was a rumbling sound in mine No. 6 at this place and a moment afterward a fearful explosion wrecked the mine and buried in the debris over 100 miners, who were cut off from all means of escape. Up to the hour of sending this despatch 40 bodies have been taken out, and at least fifteen more are expected to have met their death. The superintendent of the mine was taken out badly injured, but will survive. In the terrible excitement and confusion it is impossible to give a list of names or even an estimate as to the full extent of the disaster. It is now thought over fifty were killed.

Later news is to the effect that the mine is situated six miles from the town. There were two explosions, and it is said the total loss of life will reach 60 men. Rich Hill is located in Bates county, about 100 miles south of Kansas City on the Missouri Pacific Railway. It is in the centre of a local mining district.

FAMILY FAILURES.

Some Famous People Who Fell From Position and Wealth.

If we believe that it is better to visit the house of mourning than the house of feasting, it follows that the story of the decline and fall of our great families is better than the story of their rise and progress. It is better, we presume, inasmuch as the moral illustrative of the instability of human greatness, etc., is a profound one; otherwise the record is a truly sad one and the reading of very melancholy interest. Nevertheless it is very curious, and we venture to give here an account of some of the most noteworthy lapses of great and royal families from wealth and princely power to menial servitude and beggary. No race in Europe surpassed the Plantagenets in royal position and personal achievements, and yet, not to descend further than the year 1637, we find the great grandson of Margaret Plantagenet, daughter and heiress of George, Duke of Clarence, following the trade of a shoemaker in Newport, Salop. This is a conspicuous fall, but not more so than that of another branch of the same family, for among the lineal descendants of Edmund of Woodstock, Earl of Kent and sixth son of Edward I., occur a butcher and a toll gatherer; the first a Joseph Smart, of Halesowen, the latter a George Wilmont, keeper of the turnpike gate at Cooper's Bank, near Dudley. Then, again, among the descendants of Thomas Plantagenet, Duke of Gloucester, fifth son of Edward III., we find a Stephen James Penny, who was, not many years ago, sexton at St. George's, Hanover square. Another melancholy fall was that of the Cromwells. Before the time of the protector the family possessed estates equal to those of the wealthiest peers of the present day, and the great Oliver himself inherited considerable property, which, augmented from private sources, made up a total sufficient to maintain his family perpetually in easy circumstances. But within a century after his death we find Thomas Cromwell, his great grandson, setting up as a grocer on Snow Hill, and his son, Oliver, the last male heir, as an attorney in London. In the female line the fall was much more striking. One of the protector's granddaughters, after seeing her husband die in the workhouse of a small Suffolk town, died herself a pauper, leaving two daughters, the elder the wife of a shoemaker and the younger the wife of a butcher's son, who had been her fellow servant. Another of Oliver Cromwell's granddaughters had two children, of whom the son became a small working jeweller and the daughter the mistress of a small school at Mildenhall. When the twelfth Earl of Crawford was imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, to restrain his recklessness and prodigality, he left one child, a daughter, who, having no one whatever to look after her, received not a scrap of education and was allowed to run about like a gypsy. She eloped with a common crier, and at one period of her life lived by mendicancy. Charles II. granted her a pension of £100 a year, but owing to her utter degeneracy it proved more hurtful than beneficial. The male head of this family died in the year 1744, in the capacity of hostler in an inn at Kirkwall, in the Orkney islands. The estate had been dissipated by the "Spendthrift Earl," his father, and with his patrimony he, Lord Lindsay, Earl of Crawford, bought a small property on which he resided for some years, until through adverse fortune this went too, and to save himself from starvation he was fain to go as a hostler. A story is told of a scion of the great house of Urquhart, of Cromarty, who was necessitated by his extravagance to sell his inheritance, and who, sinking step by step to the lowest depths of wretchedness, came at last a wandering beggar to the door which had once been his own. A similar story is told by Fraser of Kirkhill, who relates that he saw the Earl of Traquair, cousin of James VI, begging in the streets of Edinburgh. "He was," says Fraser, "in an antique garb, and wore a broad old hat, short cloak and pannier breeches, and I contributed toward his relief. We gave him a noble. He was standing with his hat off, and received the piece of money from my hand as humbly as the poorest applicant."—London Telegraph.

Latest Things in Dress.

Long colored mitts are shown worn closely and plainly to the bend of the elbow, where there is a puff of escurial lace. A continuance of the same lace covers the upper arm nearly to the shoulder, where the mitt is held by an elastic band.

"Sebastopol cloth" is a fine woollen material that comes in soft and bright colors and in "cashmere" patterns that closely cover the whole surface. A very noticeable design in this stuff had a groundwork of vivid red and was figured along one edge with boughs of peach twigs, foliage and fruit, all in natural colors. Smaller brown twigs, blossoms and leaves were scattered over the rest of the cloth. The same pattern on a cream ground was much more refined in effect, though less striking.

A variety of white Henrietta cloths are in market. Some are woven in fine lines or checks; others have a plaid effect, while still another shows polka dots of various sizes.

Chinese and Indian silk pocket-handkerchiefs come in all the plain light and dark tints, both with wide and with narrow hemstitched borders. One of these bright bits of silk tucked into the front of a dark, plain gown brightens it up wonderfully. In cambric handkerchiefs a novelty is found in quarter-inch stripes of red or pink, blue or yellow and white. These handkerchiefs have narrow hems edged with a border of narrow Italian lace. Others have irregular blocks of white set thickly and promiscuously over a ground of a solid color.

Bonnet frames come in different colors of silk sheathed wire and have a thickness of tulle to match stretched over them. Two shades of red, pink, blue, heliotrope, green, yellow and gold are shown. Of course it is much better to make a transparent bonnet on a frame of the same color as the lace used, and this device is most popular.

The Sailor Girl.

When the wild geese were flying
To Flanders away,
I clung to my Desmond
Beseeching him to stay ;
But the stern trumpet sounded
The summons to sea,
And afar the ship bore him,
Mabouchal machree!

And first he sent me letters,
And then he sent me none,
And three times into prison
I dreamt he was thrown ;
So I shore my long tresses,
And stained my face brown,
And went for a sailor
From Limerick town.

Oh! the ropes cut my fingers ;
But steadfast I strove,
Till I reached the Low Country
In search of my love.
There I heard how at Namur
His heart was so high
That they carried him captive
Refusing to fly.

With that to King William
Himself I was brought,
And his mercy for Desmond
With tears I besought.
He considered my story,
Then smiling, says he,
"The young Irish rebel
For your sake is free."

"Bring the varlet before us,
Now, Desmond O Hea,
Myself has decided
Your sentence to-day.
You must marry your sailor
With bell, book and ring,
And here is her dowry,"
Cried William, the King.

ALFRED PERCIVAL GRAVES.

THE TICHBORNE CLAIMANT.

He Goes Back to England to Push His Designs on a Great Estate.

Another chapter in the checkered career of the Tichborne claimant was begun on Tuesday, says a New York despatch, when "Sir Roger," with his child-wife and 4-weeks-old heir, sailed for England in the steamer Wyoming. He goes to England, he says, to lecture under contract and to resuscitate his long-buried suit for "the estates." Sir Roger's two years' residence in America has not been profitable, his entire worldly possessions now consisting of two trunks and a valise and a few dollars in cash, the proceeds of the sale of his furniture. He says: "All I have to carry back to the Old Country is one of the best of wives and an heir to my estates, for which I have prayed these ten years. Yesterday I had only $3 in the world. Through the kindness of a New York broker, whom I knew in the Old Country, I have been able to secure a passage. I have accepted an offer to lecture at Manchester for £8 a week, and I also have a house in London, of which I have the use during my life. But before long I expect to be pretty well fixed, for I am certain of winning my case this time, and when I am master of £350,000 a year I shall not forget my old friends and those who have stood by me on this side of the water."

"What makes you so sure of winning your suit?"

"Because of the new evidence which will be produced. A few months ago my solicitors sent me over a bond to sign, by which I engaged to pay $5,000 upon gaining my estates to two gentlemen who have undertaken to go to the Cape of Good Hope, where I was shipwrecked, and recover the papers which were lost there. Their production will prove my claims beyond a shadow of a doubt. Besides this, there is the matter of a birthmark, or rather a certain physical peculiarity about me, which has never been made public and which will for ever set the matter at rest. When I come into my estates—which will happen, I am sure, within nine months, unless there are unforeseen delays—I shall first return to Australia, and then, perhaps, pay a flying visit to New York."

The Art of Owning Up.

"Knoxonian" in Canada Presbyterian.

A pastor is met at the door by a good lady parishioner, who thinks she has been neglected. She has been nursing her wrath to keep it warm. She has succeeded. She always does. Lovingly she says, "Dear me, Mr. A., is this you? Have you really found your way here? I thought you had forgotten us. You have not called for six months." "My dear madam," says the pastor, "is that all? I thought it must have been four or five years."

"Your steak is tough," growls the good man as he begins his dinner. "Yes, dear," mildly answers the good wife, "it is very tough. I thought of sending some of it down to the shoemaker's to be used in half-soling the children's boots." Better own up even in that exaggerated way than have a quarrel over the dinner table.

"This account is larger than I expected," says the customer, forgetting that accounts nearly always are larger than one expects. "These bills do run up rather fast," mildly answers the merchant. Better say that than have a wrangle over the bill, ending in a lawsuit.

The art of owning up ought to be cultivated. There are thousands of cases every day in which people might own up without the slightest sacrifice of principle or self-respect. As a rule only strong men own up, and that is one reason why there is so little of it.

"Doctoring" Milk.

The addition of the bicarbonate of soda to milk for its preservation has hitherto been tolerated by the French police, but the Council of Hygiene of the Seine has condemned the practice, as it is not free from danger. The transportation of the sugar of milk into lactic acid gives rise, in milk so adulterated, to a lactate of soda which is purgative, and is thus a cause of diarrhœa in young children. Under these conditions the Council considers that the addition of the bicarbonate of soda to milk, which is an aliment of the first order, and very often prescribed for invalids and children, should neither be authorized nor tolerated.

ACCIDENTAL MARRIAGES.

Stories of Those Who Met by Chance and Made Life Partnerships.

Marriages are often the result of accident. It seems strange, but the most prudent persons will sometimes conceive an irresistible attachment at the suggestion of a word or look. When once under the spell of the verb "to love" they go through all the forms and finish the conjugation of the verb before the altar. The few may give the subject the consideration it deserves, but the many, there is fear, are guided by impulse. A skipper of a coasting vessel called at the village inn and asked the landlady, a young widow: "Do you know where I can get a mate? I have lost my mate."

"I am sorry for you, Mr. ——," she said, "I want a mate, too, and cannot get one. I'll do; if you'll be mine, I'll be yours." He closed with the bargain, and the widow keeping her word, he is now supplied with two mates.

A young man at a church bazaar was button-holed by a lady; she would not let him go until he bought something. He looked at her stall, which contained fancy work of various kinds.

"Why," he said, "I see nothing here that would be of the least use to me, a bachelor, except yourself. The rest would be dear to me at any price."

"I will be cheap enough," she said coaxingly.

"If you could be dear enough, perhaps—"

"Oh, come! You are just the man I want," taking him by the arm.

She sold him one article after another, keeping up agreeable conversation the while, and before all was done he had purchased everything on the stall. Then at settling up there was something said about discount.

"I cannot return any money," she said, blushingly; "but if you think me dear enough, there's mamma. She can give you my hand." The bargain was accordingly concluded.

An eminent doctor, who had saved the life of a lady, a personal friend, was asked his charge. He said he generally allowed his patient friends to remunerate him as they thought befitting.

"But don't you often get disappointed on these terms?" she inquired.

"I may say, never."

"As you are so easily pleased—here," and she playfully gave him her empty hand, while in the other was concealed a cheque for a handsome sum. "How easily I could have taken you in," she added, producing the cheque.

"But you have only succeeded in drawing me out," he said, declining to relinquish her hand. "Don't insult me with a cheque. I am most generously rewarded."

Perhaps she understood the doctor's difficulty and wished to help him out of it. At any rate the giving of her hand led him to offer his heart.

This is how a gentleman got his wife when, in a tobacconist's shop, he asked a girl behind the counter, who happened to have red hair, if she would oblige him with a match.

"With pleasure, if you will have a red-headed one," she promptly replied, with such a suggestive, demure smile that eventually the red-headed match was handed over.

A lady with a fine figure having taken a fancy to a valuable ring which she saw ticketed in a shop window, went inside to examine it. "It is exceedingly lovely. I wish it were mine," she said on satisfying herself. "What smaller figure will tempt you?"

"No other figure than the figure before me," he said, giving her an admiring look at the same time "It is exceedingly lovely. I wish—I could tempt you with the ring."

"I think I'll take it," she said laying down the money amid blushes. Of course, he accepted the money, but getting her address he made such good use of the hint that the next ring which she got was given by him in church.

Quite as singular was the beginning of the courtship of the man who went into a shop for a pair of shoes.

"I want them wide, please," he said to the girl in attendance, "as I have a good, broad understanding."

She laughed at this reference to the breadth of his feet, and said:

"A very good thing, too, in a man, but not in a woman."

"How do you make out that what is good in one sex is bad in the other?"

"Ah, it is quite simple. You see nature intended man to be supported by a firm soul, but woman by a yielding husband."

Whether he made a yielding husband or not, report at any rate says that he made her his wife.—London Tid Bits.

Another Illusion Gone.

Science goes for things dear to us without mercy, says the Martha's Vineyard Herald. Everybody who has lived in the country, and who knows the old well loves the "old oaken bucket." We all love it because we have read what the poet says about it, and in our school days we chose the poem as our "piece" and spoke it. We have quenched our thirst from the old oaken bucket with its contents, after carefully looking into its dubious depths for "wigglers" or worms. We have balanced the rusty, dripping inconvenience on the curb and submerged our noses in the "nectar" we gulped. We have spilled the "crystal" on our shirt front and profanely growled as we felt it trickle down inside our collar. We have seen the leaking drizzle from a hole in the bucket spoil our 5-cent shine. We have longed under these circumstances for a cheap glass tumbler or a common tin dipper, but in all our tribulations we never thought the old oaken bucket an iron-bound death dealer, but it seems that it is, for a scientist tells us that it is "a compound, condensed mass of nitrogenous and phosphatic filthiness, the home of the microbe and the all-prevailing bacteria."

The interest in the Crossley and Hunter revival services at Belleville is increasing. It is not an unusual thing for a score or more to move up to the penitent forms when the invitations are issued. Bridge Street Church is packed nightly and many are evidently under conviction. Mr. Hunter received a telegram from his home in Ridgetown yesterday morning announcing the birth of a daughter.

ECONOMICAL NONSENSE.

Folly of Trying to Live on a Stated Number of Dollars Per Week.

There is a disease very prevalent at all times and over all the earth, says Table Talk, which Shakspeare calls "consumption of the purse" and for which many heads, wise and otherwise, are repeatedly recommending sovereign remedies. One form or stage of it, where it gallops into the exchequer of the household, has been the object, seemingly, of the closest study on the part of these "otherwise" purse physicians, whose prescriptions when adopted are followed by no beneficial results, but on the contrary by those which are absolutely mischievous. Economy is their cry and a capital cry it is, for it insures a multitude of listeners, each and all anxious to be shown how it is possible to keep the stomach full without diving into the pocket. Now economy is a good thing when we thoroughly understand the meaning of it; and we may rest assured that until we do we shall never be able to practice it. To spend money well is a more difficult task than to earn it; and indeed spending it well is one of the ways of earning it. We Americans have been accused of great waste in our kitchens and no doubt there is truth in the accusation and is likely to be until more tact, more good sense and more watchfulness be exercised by those in control of the household. But still, economy is one thing and the meanness which attempts to live on next to nothing is quite another; and it is of these attempts and their recommenders we would now speak. It is a very common thing to see in the columns of the daily papers communications, generally anonymous, asserting the possibility of a family of a stated number of persons living comfortably on a stated number of dollars per week and backing up their assertion with an array of figures whose falsity it requires but little practical investigation to prove. Many a housewife tries them and finds that the amount fixed upon as sufficient to furnish her family with all the needed food will scarcely pay for the two articles of bread and butter required for the mouths of her three or four growing children. But this is not the only nor the worst mischief that may grow out of the nonsense of these anonymous purse physicians. And we know whereof we speak. A husband who had been in the habit of giving his wife ten or fifteen dollars or more, as the case may be, for the weekly marketing, picks up his morning paper and is there told that one-half of his allowance is all that is necessary. Now, if he believes it, a rather unpleasant alternative is apt to cross his humor. Either his wife is extravagant in her purchases and pays more for her eatables than she should, or spends the surplus with the milliner and dressmaker. Of course there is many a husband whose over-fondness would forbid either end of such an alternative interfering with the uxorious tenor of his life. But there are others not thus constituted; occasionally one whose carefulness may be the result of a little stinginess, or, perhaps, of mere necessity; whose suspicions may be easily aroused, and not so easily allayed: and then comes a domestic battle which, whether it ends in smoke or something more serious, will altogether depend upon the temperament of the combatants. And all this risk and trouble because of the nonsensical desire of so-called economists to recommend to other households that which they could not, if they would, practice in their own. And now, gentlemen of the press, we have a word for your ear. Many of you are "household" men, and prudence should dictate that you bear a wary eye, lest you be hoisted, it is not by your own petard, by one that would be practically harmless without your aid.

A Notorious Woman.

Bertha Heyman, who travelled in Canada in May last under the name of Bertha Marie Brown, was arrested in San Antonio, Texas, last Friday on the strength of a telegram from the Superintendent of the Los Angeles (Cal.) police. Heyman was on her way to New Orleans with a young man named W. H. Stanley. One hundred and thirty dollars in money, five gold watches and a quantity of diamonds and jewellery were found on their persons. They also had a large amount of luggage. Heyman is considered by the police one of the cleverest confidence people in the business. She is believed to have been in Toronto only four or five weeks ago, being the housekeeper of a prominent barrister there, and succeeded in swindling the Toronto lawyer of a good portion of his wealth by means of her old racket, the worthless safe deposit. When Bertha had taken his all she then left for the South, and turned up as above.

An Association of Foremen.

An organization just formed in Pittsburg is called the "Foremen Association," and consists of foremen from every large industry in the city, from the iron mills to the paint-shops. Its object is to secure a suitable reading-room, library, gymnasium and especially a lecture hall "where new ideas, both theoretical and practical, may be exchanged;" to secure places for skilled workmen in all trades; to inaugurate a system of visits to the principal shops and mills for the interchange of suggestions and comment, and for the general advancement of the interests of the foremen themselves, of the employers for whom they work and the men whom they direct. It is the intention to make the organization a national one.—New York Sun.

Highly Flattering.

His Own Diagnosis.

Mother—And do you really feel so very bad, Bobby? Bobby—Yes, ma. I ain't quite sick enough to need any medicine, but I'm a little bit too sick to go to school.

On Tuesday last Mrs. Cooney, of Picton, started for Foxboro, and when near Coverts' tavern she was overpowered with the cold. Convulsions set in and lasted for a day. On Thursday she was taken home and Dr. Evans pronounced her disease cerebro-spinal meningitis. She lingered for a short time, when she died.

A FORTUNE IN CATS.

A New Yorker Who Has a Novel Scheme for Getting Wealth.

"How to Make a Fortune Out of Cats" is the title of a new book which is to be placed on the American market in a short time, says the New York Herald. The author is an enterprising New Yorker, who has made and lost several fortunes, and who has finally come to the conclusion that the easiest and safest way to amass filthy lucre is to breed cats on a stupendous scale. Exactly how he proposes to heap up for himself treasures on earth was fully explained by him to a reporter yesterday.

"There is an island about thirty acres in extent on the New river, in West Virginia," he began. "This island is partly in timber and partly cleared, and can be purchased for $1 000. I propose to form a stock company for the purpose of buying this island and starting a cat farm on it.

"If you will think a moment you will see that there are millions of dollars in cats. Say we start with 100.000 cats, of which 25,000 are to be black, 25.000 white, 25,000 Maltese, and 25.000 of the common domestic breed. In the course of a year the number of cats on the island will be increased to 500.000.

"When the animals are a certain age they will be killed and their skins will be dried and sold in the market. At present a cat's skin is worth 10 cents. We fully calculate on being able to kill 1,000 cats daily.

"The intestines will be sold to dealers in musical-instrument strings, and the carcasses will be put into big vats, boiled, and given as food to the live cats. The bones can, of course, be converted into glue and afterward into bone fertilizers. In one year we can kill 300.000 cats, whose skins will net us $50.000. Their bones will be worth at least $20 a ton, and their intestines and carcasses will also be worth a good deal of money. Remember, too, that by using the dead cats as food for their live brethren we are spared the expense of cat food.

"Just think, too, how beautiful a rug or carpet of white catskin, with a border of maltese, would look, and how many charming combinations could be made of the various colors! Why, ladies would buy them by the thousand, and I am positive that with an outlay of not more than $5 000 at least $50,000 could be made in a single year."

Sir James Simpson, M. D., and Chloroform.

Although chloroform, on its introduction by Sir James Y. Simpson, was well received, though it was used everywhere, from the palace to the peasant's hut, and though the danger attending its employment was, with proper care, of the slightest, Simpson himself was always seeking for another and superior anæsthetic. The experiments into which he was thus led were sometimes unfortunate in their results. On one occasion he was found lying helpless, apparently, but not really, unconscious, by one of his women-servants. She called the butler to aid in restoring her master to consciousness, and Simpson heard the latter (a firm believer in the virtues of chloroform) say: "He says he's trying to find out something else, and he's just a big fule, for he'll never get onything better than the chlory." It is said that this candid opinion acted as an admirable restorative, and the doctor roused himself from his swoon to have a hearty laugh at his retainer's words.

Does the Earth Really Move?

Science says that it does, but we cannot help wondering sometimes if there isn't some mistake about it, when we see how stubbornly certain old fogies cling to their musty and antiquated ideas. It was believed once that consumption was incurable, and although it has been clearly demonstrated that it is not, thousands of old-time physicians close their eyes and put their hands to their ears and refuse to abandon the theory. But for all that the world moves on, and Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery continues to rescue sufferers from consumptives' graves. It is a sure cure for this dreaded disease, if taken in time. All scrofulous diseases—and consumption is included in the list—yield to it.

Shall Women be Allowed to Vote?

The question of Female suffrage has agitated the tongues and pens of reformers for many years, and good arguments have been adduced for and against it. Many of the softer sex could vote intelligently, and many would vote as their husbands did, and give no thought to the merits of a political issue. They would all vote for Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, for they know it is a boon to their sex. It is unequaled for the cure of leucorrhea, abnormal discharges, morning sickness and the countless ills to which women are subject. It is the only remedy for woman's peculiar weaknesses and ailments, sold by druggists under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. See guarantee on wrapper around bottle.

Good Ground for Hope.

"Purgatory Bullets."

An excited Irishman lately rushed into a Boston drug store, having a "broken up appearance generally. "Be jabbers!" he yelled, "I'm all wrong entoirely. I want some shtuff to straighten me out. Some o' thim 'Purgatory Bullets' will fix me, I'm thinkin'. What d'ye tax for them?" "What do you mean?" asked the clerk. "'Purgatory Bullets,' sor, or somethin' loike that, they call thim," replied the man. "Shure, I'm in purgatory already, with headache, and liver complaint, and bad stomach, and the devil knows what all." The clerk passed out a vial of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, and Pat went off contented. These little Pellets cure all derangements of liver, stomach and bowels. Sugar-coated, little larger than mustard seeds, and pleasant to take. Druggists.

RESTAURANTS IN CONGO.

Monkeys on Toast, Smoked Elephant and Broiled Alligator.

I know of no people who get oysters from trees but the Mandingoes, through whose country flow the Senegal and Gambia Rivers. The bivalves are taken from the branches, to which they attach themselves during high tide. Here is a Mandingo bill of fare, which Reade, the explorer, leaves on record for the amusement of the curious: "Then followed," he says, "gazelle cutlets a la papillote; two small monkeys, served cross-legged and with liver sauce on toast; stewed iguana, which was much admired; a dish of roasted crocodile's eggs; some slices of smoked elephant (from the interior); a few agreeable plates of fried locusts, land crabs and other crustacea; the breasts of mermaid, or manatee, the grand bonne-bouche of the repast; some boiled alligator and some hippopotamus steaks." While this dinner does not equal in courses some of the elaborate feasts of civilized lands, certainly no one will say that it lacked variety. Lotus seeds form one of the most common dishes known to the Barri of Central Africa. The pods when gathered are bored and strung on reeds and hung in the sun for drying, after which they get to the table. Along the upper Nile another wing of the Barri tribe bleed their cattle monthly and cook the blood with their flour and meal. They esteem this luxury and the dish is eaten with great reliah.—New York Star.

Dr. Crowther, of Baltimore, probably owes his life to his parrot. The cries of the bird awakened him at 3 o'clock in the morning. He discovered that his house was on fire, and had barely time to awaken his family and get them out before the building was completely wrapped in flames.

WHAT AILS YOU?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Diseases, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malaria, dispels, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

Dr Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

CURES ALL HUMORS,

from a common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Tumors, or Lump, in the Neck, and Enlarged Glands. Send ten cents in stamps for a large Treatise, with colored plates, on Skin Diseases, or the same amount for a Treatise on Scrofulous Affections.

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse it by using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, vital strength and bodily health will be established.

CONSUMPTION,

which is Scrofula of the Lungs, is arrested and cured by this remedy, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease. From its marvelous power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now world-famed remedy to the public, Dr. Pierce thought seriously of calling it his "CONSUMPTION CURE," but abandoned that name as too restrictive for a medicine which, from its wonderful combination of tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, anti-bilious, pectoral, and nutritive properties, is unequaled, not only as a remedy for Consumption, but for all Chronic Diseases of the Liver, Blood, and Lungs.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Severe Coughs, and kindred affections, it is an efficient remedy.

Sold by Druggists, at $1.00, or Six Bottles for $5.00.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The Markdale Standard talked quite learnedly about "green-eyed monsters" last week. People around here do not know much about such things, but it is evidently different in Markdale. We commend the Standard for enlightening us in regard to the matter. It has evidently a practical acquaintance with the subject.

The Standard published an article anent "Inconsistency" last week. Here again our contemporary gives an excellent and life-like picture of itself! Really the Standard must have got into the confessional by mistake. Seldom are people so open and frank elsewhere!

Winter is alright in its place; but when it lingers so long in the lap of spring one begins to wonder whether the summer will escape a frigid embrace from the old rascal or not!

A comparison of the Markdale Standard's editorial remarks anent "green-eyed monsters" with those contained in the article immediately following—in reference to one of its own most influential and highly respected townsmen—is rather interesting as well as significant. The world looks green to those who gaze at it through green-colored spectacles, as all looks yellow to the jaundiced eye; but seldom are the public treated to such an astonishing exhibition of verdant greenness as in the case under consideration. If only post-office and printing office could be brought together under one roof, however, Standard readers would seldom be afflicted with twaddle about "green-eyed monsters." The green goggles would soon find their way into the "shelf" box!

A glance over the advertising columns of both the Durham newspapers, shows that the leading merchant of upper town is still endeavoring to boom fall and winter goods, the leading ditto of lower town is earnestly soliciting customers to buy furs, woollens and such like, while the jeweller considers it necessary to let the public know that he has just the right kind of goods for the Christmas holidays! Although Flesherton is only 15 or 16 miles distant from Durham, our business men consider it about the right time of year to boom spring millinery and such like, while our Fighting Editor has been on the watch for Spring Poets and Book Agents several weeks. He has filed the bull dog's teeth real sharp and has been practicing on the sand bag every day of

SHORTHAND RITING.

The Fighting Editor Relates His Experience.

A number of persons in Flesherton are striving to become proficient in the science of Phonography, under the wise and energetic supervision of Wm. Irwin, Esq., Principal of our Public Schools. The latter gentleman has few equals in the matter of imparting knowledge. He takes a delight in the business, and by his earnestness and zeal awakens an intense and yearning interest within the breasts of those who are his pupils.

I am slightly inclined to be ambitious. I suppose I inherit it from somebody. A short time ago a yearning desire took possession of my soul to acquire the art or science of Phonography. The idea grew at an amazing rate. Finally I learned to my joy that Mr. Irwin was a shorthander and I made arrangements to take a course with him. I studied the consonants, vowels, diphthongs and occasionally startled my friends by breaking out with such intelligible and edifying monysyllables as ..."Pee, bee, too, chay, jay, kay, gay, em, en, ing, way, omp, ray, arch, yay, kway, gway," and so on. You see I wanted to keep the pesky things fastened in my mind. I noticed people snickering occasionally, but that didn't stop me. Next I tackled the vowels. They bothered me considerably. I got them mixed. Then I'd make a fresh start in an audible tone, thus:—"Ah, eh, ee, aw, oh, oo,' &c. I did this one night after I had retired, and my wife anxiously enquired if I was sick. In reply I took a sudden jump into the dipthongs, "I, ow, oi, u, I, ow, oi, u."

Things went on in this way until I came to the s's. Prefix s and final s, double ss, adding n and f, adding s to pr, prefix st, final st, and all the rest of it. It was about this time that my brains began to knock around amongst each other and mentally ask me to give them a rest. It was no use. My whole being seemed full of s's and hooks and loops. I got mad, but that didn't help me. If anything, the hook and crook fever grew worse. I dreamt of nothing else. Some times, in my dreams, a great big fellow with a huge S on his shoulder would come along and threaten to give me a whack on the head with it. When I awoke in the morning the room seemed full of s's—in fact I wasn't sure but what my whole body was s shaped.

The "half sized consonants" did not trouble me much, except when they came in collision with those maddening s's. Then—but why say more on that score? I am now making a determined assault upon the "W and Y series of Dipthongs" and the "Grammalogues or Letter-Words." I went over the former in the presence of his serene Satanic Majesty of THE ADVANCE printing office in an audible tone, thus: "Wah, weh, wee, waw, woh, woo; yah, yeh, yee, yaw, yoh, yoo.' The devil scratched his head for a minute, winked his left eye solemnly at the Sporting Editor, and then tapped his forehead with painful significance. I stopped suddenly and reached for my Spring Poet Annihilator. The devil skipped out of the road with unusual celerity. Since then I have courted solitude and solitary places and can "wah, woh, wee" and "yah, yoh, yee" to my heart's content.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuses will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams &c., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, often times innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally, from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.

Manitoba.

To the Editor of The Advance.

Your "own correspondent" has "something to say" Of weather, and wind, and news of the day.

And will commence with the month of "many weathers," then rambling note as usual, trying to recompense you for your kindness, and benefit others by imparting truthful and useful information through THE ADVANCE, a paper that I, and those who once resided in the County of Grey, cannot well do without, as it is a connecting link between the old world and the new—Ontario and Manitoba.

Telling much that's done and said,
In church and state, by which we're "fed,"
And how Canadians go ahead.

MARCH

Is "Marching on" with its "many weathers," minus thaws and rains, as in Ontario, but windy and snowy—a little. Clear and cloudy, sunshine and, well, a little more WIND. However, as there is such a "sameness" in the winter months here, March would have to seize upon one of the few blizzards to "come in (with) like a roaring lion," or get up a "special" of its own if the blizzard is not "on time."

THIS WINTER,

"They say," is more severe than usual, but has not materially affected out of door operations. Sleighing is good, no "wallowing in the snow," there being only a few inches "o'er the levelled ground," no January thaw, no rain, no mud—just one long cold, cold winter. But you would be surprised to see the school children and others playing out of doors, same as in Ontario. Church-going journeying, &c., but sometimes—

"The bleak wind, in blaster loud, Drives sailing o'er the snowy cloud,"

and—

Jack Frost bites (King Winter's son
"You'd better believe" a storm's begun.
The whirling wind and drifting snow,
Impede your progress as you go.
Then stay indoors, if you can,
Nor risk your life, presumptuous man.

Yet it is wonderful how well people generally endure the intense cold—in fact many of them seem to enjoy it, reminding me of expressions of lunatics, who have regained their reason,—

"There is a joy in being mad,
Which none but mad men know."

Now a few words about—

BLIZZARDS AND CYCLONES.

Much reference is made by Southerners on Manitoba and Dakota blizzards; but give me the blizzards (which are few and far between) instead of cyclones of the South or any other country. A blizzard seldom destroys a building or causes great loss of life; but a cyclone—well, if ever the "Prince of the power of the air" manifests himself in the air, as the "evil one," it certainly is in a cyclone; but, fortunately, they do not occur here.

Permit me to change an old saying a little by remarking, that "Spring lingers long in the lap of Winter," although the first spring month has nearly March(ed) out.

ADVICE.

Again I say to all: If you are comfortable where you are, or likely to become so, stay where you are; if not, just come this way, but DON'T LEAVE CANADA.

WM. PURDY.

Winnipeg, March 28th, 1888.

If you have a cold, cough, bronchitis, or any form of throat or lung disease, do not neglect it. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, if promptly taken, will speedily relieve and cure all ailments of this character.

Meaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. James Hanson and family left here last week for Caledonia. Mr. Hanson will reside in Woodstock during the coming summer, where he will practice the veterinary business.

Mr. John I. Graham and wife have left the valley and come up to the Meaford Road to live.

Mrs. Pritchard has removed her store business to the dwelling house on the school premises.

A new boiler of forty-five horse-power has been put in the steam saw mill.

Mr. S. Osburn has bought the old Vandeleur emporium.

Mr. J. C. McConnell has started a waggon shop at Vandeleur.

There is some talk of a wedding in the neighborhood, of which more anon.

Messrs. D. Walker and G. Pritchard are going very extensively into the sugar making business.

TAMARAC ELIXIR is not advertised to cure consumption, but it has made some remarkable cures of persons supposed to be in the first stages of that disease.

Owen Sound.

From our own Correspondent.

Several loud whispers of "Spring!" but no bold assertions for fear the ghost of March may scare April into a fit of snow-storms!

Mr. Chas. Gordon, one of the first settlers of Sydenham, died Mar. 29, at the age of 67.

Mr. J. T. Habart, baker, died suddenly at his residence last week. Deceased had been suffering from asthma.

A farewell supper was given at the Ross House last week, in honor of Mr. W. H. Heart, barrister, who has left town to continue his profession at Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. George Belford, dramatic reciter, appears in Owen Sound this week, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A.

Mr. J. Masson, M. P., was home for his Easter holidays and left again for the capital accompanied by his wife.

Capt. Anderson, of the Alberta, and wife, arrived here from Sarnia last week.

The Emma Wells Co. played to good houses here last week. She is the only four-voiced vocalist, and an excellent pianist.

Free medical lectures will be held in the Y. M. C. A. from time to time. Dr. Geo. Dow lectured on "Physiology of the Brain, on Monday evening.

Rev. A. H. Scott, pastor of the Presbyterian Church (Knox) preached his farewell sermon last Sunday evening.

Condensed Novel—Thos. McCleary was taken from the O. S. gaol Saturday, on a conviction of larceny; courted a girl on Sunday, married her on Monday; got drunk on Tuesday; took up residence in the lock-up on Wednesday; was ushered into the Magistrates presence on Thursday, and spent Friday in gaol. He was discharged on Saturday at the earnest request of his wife, so that they might again spend a happy Sunday together!

Mr. W. E. Caiger, Advertising Agent for the Toronto News, says—I was induced to try Nasal Balm for a severe and troublesome Cold in the Head. Once using it literally washed out the clogged secretions, and left my head clear as a bell!

Handles to Names.

Hamilton Spectator.

Matthew Arnold admits that he found just one thing about American civilization that meets with his approval. It was that the Americans do not, in addressing a letter, commit the folly of writing "Esquire" after a person's name. That is true: they do not use the useless and meaningless "Esq." at the back end of the name, but they make ample amends for this lapse into common sense by writing "Hon." or "Col." or "Gen." in front of the name. Some time, when the world grows wise, the habit of ornamenting the names of people who have no right to titles will be dropped. Even the "Mr." ought to go. It does not mean anything. "Mrs." is sometimes of some use, as when a lady's name is written "Mrs. John Smith." But if the name be written "John Smith," without prefix nobody could suppose that it meant Mrs. John Smith—it means John himself just as much without the "Mr." as with it. If a man be an honorable, or a Sir, or an M.P., or a Q.C., or a doctor, it is as well to give him his title: but if he is not entitled to some handle to his name the fact is made manifest in "John Smith," just as much as in "Mr. John Smith."

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head: but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

How pleasant it would be, she was thinking, as she leaned there, with the sharp wind reviving her wearied senses, to go away with Guy from all this misery, to be cared for and loved as he would care for and love her, to be his own forever. Dear Guy!

Presently a gay chime of bells rang out, sounding clearly on the keen frosty air, and Alice Fairholme and Ruby came in, in their dainty and very becoming grenat velvet dresses, to act as Shirley's tire-women. They gathered up the pretty hair high upon her head and wreathed it with fragrant orange-flowers, and robed her in the glistening white satin and filmy lace, and clasped the diamonds round her throat and on her wrists, and threw the soft lace veil over her, and no lovelier bride did mirror ever reflect than Shirley Ross, as, leaning on her uncle's arm, she walked up the aisle to where Guy stood waiting for her and watching her with his heart in his eyes.

All Shirley's senses seemed quickened in this supreme moment; it seemed to her that she saw all over the church, and that every face of the crowd assembled there was distinct and separate. She saw the pretty eager bridesmaids, Lady Fairholme stately in green velvet and chinchilla, Guy so grand-looking and stately, with the look in his eyes which made her heart thrill. She heard the opening words of the marriage-service; then the sound of galloping horses and flying wheels fell upon her ears. The next moment there was some confusion in the body of the church, and a man breathless with haste, and agitated, came up the aisle—a tall, handsome man, who looked haggard, and wore his right arm in a sling, but whom many present recognized as Sir Hugh Glynn.

"Stop!" he said haughtily and imperatively, conquering his agitation as he reached the bridal party. "This marriage must not continue."

"Hugh!" Guy exclaimed in intense surprise, while Sir Gilbert gently but firmly put him aside.

"By what right do you thus interrupt my niece's marriage, Sir Hugh?" he said, haughtily, his face pale with anger.

"By the best of all rights," was the equally haughty answer. "She is my wife!"

CHAPTER XXI.

"Shirley, for the love of Heaven speak. Contradict the story this man is telling so plausibly; let me crush back his falsehoods into his throat. For pity's sake, do not stand there and let him bring such an accusation against you!"

The words broke from Guy Stuart's lips with a force and passion which left him pale as death, and each fell like a blow on the heart of the girl to whom they were addressed, and who dared not lift her eyes to the pleading, anguish-stricken face of the man she loved so deeply, but to whom she had brought the most terrible agony that heart could know.

They were gathered in the oak parlor at Fairholme Court, while the bewildered and startled household whispered among themselves that some dreadful thing had happened, since the bridal carriages had returned almost immediately from the church, and Miss Shirley looked more dead than alive, and Miss Alice was threatening hysterics.

Sir Gilbert, his face stern and grave and full of pain, stood by the mantel-piece, resting his elbow upon it, the old wound, which had never healed, now torn open afresh. Lady Fairholme was trying to soothe Alice, who was crying and laughing alternately; and Oswald, his countenance grave and pained and wondering, had gone to Guy's side, and stood there, with earnest sympathy for the agony in Guy's pale, despairing, anguish-stricken face on his own. Shirley stood alone; but Ruby Capel had crept near her, hiding her face in her hands to still her sobs; and Sir Hugh Glynn, haughty, erect, and resolute, stood by the table, his head thrown back defiantly, his right arm in a sling.

It was a strange scene, and one which those that saw it never forgot. Shirley was the central figure, as she stood at the opposite side of the table to Sir Hugh, her long dress sweeping the floor in glistening, lustrous folds, the lace veil still falling around her, although she had thrown it back from her face, the diamonds glittering at her throat and on her wrists. Her face was white to the lips; a heavy shadow of brooding despair, almost desperation, had fallen upon it, and it had drained the blood from her cheeks, so that she stood motionless and colorless as a statue. It might have been the face of a dead woman for all the life and color which was in it, save when a sudden passionate quiver passed over it, like the quick light of a flame which flickers up ere it dies away

"Shirley," Guy's passionate broken voice said eagerly, "only one word, dear; but no—you need not speak, you need not contradict him. I know that all he has said is false—false as himself."

"But that I pity your suffering, and that I think of our old friendship, such words would not be long unrevenged," put in Sir Hugh slowly, a flush coloring his pale haggard face, and his blue eyes turning to Major Stuart with an angry menace in their depths. "Why is she silent? If she could do so, do you think she would not refute the charge? She knows that I have right on my side, and witnesses to prove that right. Have you such faith in her," he went on scornfully, "that you will not see that she repented the bargain she had made—that she perceived that a baronet with money was better worth having than a penniless officer? Her sex is not usually noted for disinterestedness," he continued bitterly, for the mute scorn which overpowered even the pain on Shirley's pale face lashed him to fury, "You were not very long gone when she permitted me to——"

"Kiss her hand in the hall," gasped Alice Fairholme vindictively through her sobs; and a flash of indignant contempt came into Oswald's eyes as he turned them on his sister's face.

"Thank you, Miss Fairholme," said Sir Hugh. "I am glad to have my assertion corroborated. Yes; it is perfectly true; and, if my subsequent conduct has seemed treacherous to you, Stuart, it is because I believed this lady's assurance that she had written to break off her engagement to you."

Shirley's face changed then; a terrible bitterness, a great horror, an irrepressible loathing came over it, and she lifted her eyes and fixed them on Sir Hugh with an expression he could not meet.

"Shirley," Major Stuart broke out, indignation, entreaty, and pain in his ce, "this is unendurable. Love, you know I do not doubt you—not for one moment—but to satisfy these others utter just one word of denial. Darling, I do not doubt you, remember," he added with earnest tenderness. "It is not to clear yourself in my eyes; I can never doubt you!"

"No, you cannot,—you never will," Shirley said, in a voice so unlike her usual tone that every person in the room turned and looked at her, while Ruby rose quietly and drew nearer to her side.

"It would greatly simplify matters," put in Sir Gilbert sternly, "if you would deny the charge brought against you, Shirley. Where were you on the afternoon of the third of January?"

"I remember," Miss Fairholme said suddenly in the silence which followed. "She was out all the afternoon, and when she came in—quite late it was—she fainted in the hall!"

With a quick look Shirley's eyes turned upon her cousin's face; and Ruby Capel stole nearer to her side and put her arm around her. The girl made no sign that she even felt the gentle caress; she was utterly motionless—only the anguish on her face and the restless eyes showed how she was suffering.

"And I met you in the hall," Sir Gilbert said severely; "and I saw Sir Hugh take leave of you in the hall, and—and——"

His voice failed, and he turned away in great agitation. Every eye in the room was turned on Shirley now, but she did not quail.

"Shirley, why don't you speak?" said her Cousin Alice, quickly, in her clear high tones. "Why don't you deny it?"

"Because I cannot."

The words came slowly and feebly from Shirley's lips, as if her very heart-strings were torn in the utterance, and Ruby Capel felt the shudder that ran through her. For a moment her lids sunk heavily, as if she were going to faint; but the next she rallied and lifted the beautiful head which had drooped, with a gesture of the old queen-like grace.

"Do you mean that you went to Dumfife with Sir Hugh Glynn?" demanded her uncle sternly.

"Yes."

"That at the Half-Moon Inn you passed as his wife and called him your husband?"

"Yes."

"And that this story he has told us is correct?"

"Correct as to the facts," she said, in the same slow faint voice—"yes."

It was painful to hear her as the words fell from her lips; it was terrible to see the agony of scorn and horror which crushed out all the life and beauty of the fair face. Sir Gilbert turned away with a groan; the old wound was deeply probed, and it was bleeding profusely under the hand which had so rudely torn it open.

There was a short silence then, broken by Major Stuart's voice, which was deep and low and strained, from the terrible restraint he put upon himself.

"Shirley," he said, gently, "since you have told that you went to Dumfife with Sir Hugh Glynn, you will tell us now your object in doing so. Why did you go, Shirley? There must have been some pressing reason to make you take such a step."

The look of hopeless anguish deepened in the girl's eyes as they went to his face for a moment, and her lips quivered.

"I cannot tell you," she said, painfully. "Try to trust me still, Guy."

A look of distress and disappointment passed over Major Stuart's face, and his eyes, as they met hers, were full of an entreaty which pierced Shirley to the heart; but she had given a promise to Jack, and she could not tell him now before her uncle and aunt.

"If you can trust me, Guy," she said, piteously, putting out two little supplicating hands, "I will tell you—when—when we are alone."

"When you can use your blandishments to deceive him!" put in Alice Fairholme, with bitter significance. "You are a bad false girl; and I, for one, have never been deceived in you. Sir Hugh's story——"

"Mother," Oswald Fairholme interrupted, with quick earnestness, "take Alice away; she is upset by all this. She does not know what she is saying."

Oswald's tone was too significant and earnest to be disregarded; and Lady Fairholme bent over her daughter, and half led, half forced her from the room, making a sign to Ruby to follow her; but Miss Capel saw by Shirley's quick glance of entreaty that her presence afforded some consolation to the unhappy girl, and she remained and was thanked by a quick grateful look from Captain Fairholme's dark eyes.

"I can trust you without the aid of your blandishments, my darling," Guy said, moving towards Shirley, when Sir Hugh, with a quick movement, came between them.

"Pardon me," he said, haughtily. "You forget, I think, that I claim that lady as my wife."

Guy fell back, paling to his lips, a quick gleam of passion flashing into his gray eyes and a passionate execration rising to his lips. The two men stood for a moment looking at each other, and a glance of terrible menace was exchanged; then Sir Hugh moved back to his place, and turned to Sir Gilbert with perfect courtesy and composure.

"Sir Gilbert," he said gravely, "I cannot tell you how it grieves me to be the cause of so much sorrow and annoyance to you and yours, more especially as I know that this must be a particularly painful thing to you. I loved your niece from the beginning of my acquaintance with her, and I confess that her engagement to my friend gave me deep pain. Had she been satisfied with and happy in that engagement, I should have never interfered; but even in Major Stuart's presence she openly declared that her heart was not in her engagement but her dread of your displeasure made her hesitate to break it off."

"You scoundrel!" Guy cried savagely, between his teeth. "What a tissue of lies!"

"Major Stuart," interposed Sir Gilbert, with a grave dignity that became him well, "I cannot allow you to forget that you are under my roof, and that Sir Hugh Glynn is my visitor."

"Shirley's dread of your displeasure made her hesitate to break off her engagement, of which you and Lady Fairholme cordially approved. Together we devised the plan which we subsequently carried out, I being still under the impression that she had written to Major Stuart to cancel the promise she had given him. You will remember perhaps that on the day following that on which I had made your niece my wife according to the law of the country, I was called away by my mother's illness. On the day that I arrived at Cannes I met with a carriage accident which resulted in a broken arm and some slight head injuries. I could not write to my wife."

A cry of unutterable anguish broke from Shirley and silenced the smooth flow of words which sounded so plausible to the hearers—a cry sharp and sudden. She shuddered from head to foot, as though a red-hot iron had touched her flesh; and for the first time her courage failed her. Her limbs trembled and gave way, she sunk upon her knees, Ruby's arms around her and supporting her, and her head fell back against Miss Capel. But she was not unconscious; she could see and hear all that passed; and something in the helpless attitude bespoke a suffering terrible to witness. It was harrowing to Guy Stuart, to the man who loved her with such a great love, who trusted her with such a perfect faith, to see her there in all the glory of her satin and lace and diamonds, pale and drooping like a flower broken at the stem and left to die.

"I could not write to my wife myself," Sir Hugh went on, rather hoarsely—he too loved her—ay, and loved her well in her way, but selfishly and cruelly; "and I did not like to let another for me; so I waited. As soon as I could spare his attendance, I sent my confidential servant to Scotland to see Shirley. Immediately on his arrival he dispatched a telegram, telling me that my wife was about to marry another man. I left Cannes immediately—at the risk of my life, the physicians said; but that matters little, since I was in time to prevent a crime."

Sir Hugh concluded, as he had spoken, amid perfect silence, and Sir Gilbert, to whom he had addressed himself, bowed slightly. Captain Fairholme was standing with his hand upon Guy's arm, his face full of earnest sympathy and pain because of the anguish and anger upon Major Stuart's dark face; and Ruby, still supporting Shirley in her arms, was watching, with nameless fear, the miserable aching eyes so wide and desolate, the pale lips from which the quick gasping breaths came almost like sobs.

"I must thank you for the patient hearing that you have given me," Sir Hugh continued gravely. "And now let me ask you, Sir Gilbert, what your opinion is. The lawyer—a distinguished member of his profession—Mr. Duncan, of Perth—whom I consulted on the subject, gave it as his opinion that the laws of this country made your niece my wife, and that, even if I wished to do so, I could not disown the marriage."

"It is impossible!" Captain Fairholme cried, breaking in passionately. "Even the abominable law in force in this country cannot make that a marriage!"

"Less even is needed to make a marriage in Scotland," said Sir Hugh, with a slight smile. "It behooves one to be careful in this country, Captain Fairholme. Sir Gilbert will tell you so, I think; and, indeed, if Shirley and myself had done innocently what we did willingly, we should have been equally married, and we should have had to make the best of it."

"Uncle Gilbert"—Shirley's voice, faint, gasping, tremulous, broke in here—"is that true?"

"It is true," Sir Gilbert said, with grave sadness; and a moan like the moan of a man in physical pain broke from Guy Stuart.

Shirley looked at him pitifully; she had known what the answer would be; she knew that less had made her mother the wife of a man whom she had never meant to marry. She felt that all was lost; and yet the misery on Guy's face rendered her desperate. That she should have wounded him, she who loved him so madly, who would have died for him, who would willingly have crept to his feet and prayed for forgiveness as if she had brought this anguish to him wilfully. For his sake she fought against the certainty which seemed to have frozen her blood as she knelt there, inert and powerless, able only to suffer.

"Uncle Gilbert," she said, in a voice so broken with passionate agitation and bitterest pain that it was difficult to understand what she said, "are you sure? Is there no room for doubt? I know—I know my mother's story; but—another judgment! Oh, it is impossible," she cried, rising to her feet with a sudden despairing strength; "it is impossible that a few jesting words can have made me that man's wife. Uncle Gilbert, if you have any pity, tell me that all this is some horrible dream!"

She stood swaying to and fro, as she pushed back the hair from her forehead and ruthlessly swept aside the costly lace. Sir Gilbert could not look at her; she was so like her mother as she stood there, suffering as her mother had suffered, cursed as her mother had been cursed. Ah, if that mother had lived but one short hour more, how differently her child's life would have been ordered, how much anguish she would have been spared!

"Guy," she said, passionately, as Sir Gilbert remained silent, "he might listen to you. He was your friend once."

"My friend? Yes," Guy muttered bitterly, "and therefore his treachery is ten times greater, the villain!"

"Stuart—for Shirley's sake!" interposed Oswald Fairholme, hastily. "Glynn, can nothing be done? Will you not give up this claim?"

"Captain Fairholme, if I wished to back out of the marriage, I could not do so," said Sir Hugh, somewhat impatiently. "Who can tell what may occur in the future to induce your cousin to stand up for the law which she now repudiates? We cannot see into the future; nor can we tell what circumstances may arise to render it advisable in your cousin's eyes that she should claim the title and position which undoubtedly belong to her as my wife."

"His wife!" Shirley echoed, with an expression of unutterable scorn and hatred in her beautiful eyes. "His wife!"

As she uttered the words she realized for the first time what her position was. Loving one man with all her heart and soul and strength—even as Marian Fairholme twenty years before had loved Roland Ross—she was bound for life to another. All the anguish that the mother had borne the child must bear, all the pain of knowing that her present position was her own fault; that she had brought sorrow and despair to darken forever the life for which she would, oh, so gladly, have given her own! The story Latreille had told his master six weeks before had been ably acted upon.

The laws of the land in which they lived had made her the wedded wife of the man who stood watching her with eager blue eyes, in which was some tenderness perhaps, but more triumph. She was married to a man whom not only did she not love and respect, but whom she scorned and contemned and hated for his base treachery, his despicable lies. She was his for all her life, and nothing could keep her from him, no power, no love, no devotion. As the full knowledge of all she had lost broke upon her bewildered senses, her strength gave way. Without a word, without a movement to save herself, she dropped at Ruby's feet, a mass of costly satin and lace and diamonds, and her colorless face was like the face of a dead woman.

CHAPTER XXII.

"Alice, I can't understand you; you are so unlike yourself."

"On the contrary," Miss Fairholme said haughtily, "it is you, Ruby, who seem to have lost all correct judgment and all sense of what is right and wrong."

"I would rather lose all correct judgment than be utterly devoid of compassion and pity, or even common humanity," returned Ruby doggedly.

"I have plenty of compassion and pity for objects that deserve it," said Miss Fairholme scornfully—"not for a girl who by the meanest falsehoods and most despicable behavior has obtained her end and has made herself the wife of one of the wealthiest men in Scotland."

"A girl who by the meanest falsehoods and the most despicable and basest treachery has been trapped into breaking her own heart and the heart of the man whom she loves," corrected Ruby with an angry sob.

"Ah—so she says!" said Alice, sententiously.

"Alice, this is too bad!" cried Ruby passionately through the hot angry tears which rose in her eyes as she looked at Alice's pretty contemptuous face, as, in the prettiest of invalid wrappers, she lay on a couch in the oak parlor.

It was the afternoon of the day following Shirley's wedding day. Already the first terrible excitement was over, and the household had resumed its ordinary routine.

The pretty bridal robes had been folded away, Sir Jasper Stuart's regal wedding-gift had been once more placed upon its satin bed, the decorations had been taken from the walls, the wedding-favors put aside. Only Sir Gilbert's gloomy brow and Lady Fairholme's preoccupied countenance showed that something had gone wrong; and in the servants' hall the men and maids talked with bated breath of the anguish on Guy Stuart's haggard face and of Miss Alice's hysterics—but Miss Ross they did not see.

Sir Hugh Glynn had proved himself perfectly reasonable, and even considerate. He acquiesced cordially in Captain Fairholme's suggestion that legal advice should be obtained; and the same day Oswald and Guy had gone to Edinburgh, where they thought it could be best obtained. Sir Hugh had gone back to Maxwell, declining Sir Gilbert's invitation to remain at the Court. His presence there would be an intrusion, he said, in the present circumstances; he would await Major Stuart's return at his own house.

Alice, whose vanity had received a terrible blow—for she had considered Sir Hugh a captive to her own bow and spear, and was greatly mortified at having lost all chance of such a brilliant parti—had chosen to take what she called her cousin's "infamous behavior" so deeply to heart that she was suffering from a nervous attack which required a great deal of attention, but which did not interfere with her flirtation with her brother's friends, both of whom, at Lady Fairholme's request, remained at the Court; while Shirley had not left her room, whither she had been carried in the long death-like swoon which had followed the terrible strain she had endured for so long; and the only persons who had seen her were Ruby Capel and Delphine, Alice's maid, whose romantic heart had been touched by the girl's terrible position, and who, moreover, had all a Frenchwoman's love of intrigue; while Ruby, in her earnest sympathy, had cried till her pretty dark eyes became red and stiff.

On recovery from her long fainting fit, Shirley had behaved very quietly; she was almost too exhausted for anything else. She felt but little, and she feared but little, for all power of thought seemed gone. She pressed Ruby's hand with a faint little grateful pressure when she found her head lying on Miss Capel's shoulder and the pretty piquant face, with a tender pity unusual to it, bending over her; then she closed her eyes wearily again, and let herself drift away into a half stupor which lasted until evening.

Ruby did not leave her all that night. Under her quick impulsive exterior the little heiress hid a very loving heart, and all her pity and tenderness were aroused for Shirley. It did not matter to her that almost every one at Fairholme Court condemned Shirley, she felt it in her inmost heart that the girl was true; and she laid the aching head on her bosom, and pressed her lips to the burning brow with a tenderness which was an inexpressible comfort to Shirley in her desolation.

Toward evening, when Shirley roused up and found Ruby still watching by her pillow, her natural unselfishness asserted itself. She insisted on making Ruby rest on the couch; and, to please her, the girl acquiesced, while Shirley sat beside her, holding her hand in her little hot fingers, and speaking now and then a few words of thankful gratitude for Ruby's tenderness and consideration.

Presently Delphine brought in a tray, and Shirley made a feint of eating, to induce Ruby to have some dinner; and when the evening wore on into night, the two girls went to rest, and Ruby cried herself to sleep in Shirley's arms. But no sleep came to the other girl's wide aching eyes. It seemed to Shirley that she would never sleep again.

The next day passed very quietly. Shirley rose and dressed, looking the very wraith of her former self in the black velveteen dress that she wore; but, with a very natural shrinking from attracting attention, she remained in her own room, in and out of which Ruby flitted, trying to cheer her, and quite happy if she brought a faint smile to the pale stiff lips.

Neither Sir Gilbert nor Lady Fairholme had expressed any wish to see the unhappy girl. Her ladyship indeed thought her guilty of great deception and untruthfulness. She believed with her daughter that Shirley had done her utmost to compass a marriage with Sir Hugh, and had not scrupled to use any means to attain her end. She was, moreover, greatly incensed with Sir Hugh for having paid Alice considerable attention when his real affections were already given to her cousin; and her indignation took the form of a great deal of petting of Alice, whom she persisted in regarding as terribly ill-used, and as suffering greatly from the exhaustion resulting from the shock which such a disgraceful affair had caused her. And Alice, in the most coquettish of wrappers, her pretty hair daintily arranged, lay back upon her cushions and accepted all these attentions, and looked interesting, as Ruby declared angrily, with all her might.

But the effort to look interesting was not necessary just now, for only Ruby was with her in the oak parlor, and she was too angry with Miss Capel for her championship of Shirley to retain the sweet resigned expression which she had so successfully assumed. At present her fair face was disfigured by an expression of vindictive anger and dislike, and her thin lips were drawn down at the corners with scorn and contempt.

"My dear Ruby," she said coolly, in answer to Miss Capel's indignant exclamation, "it is very charming to see such faith as yours; but you must remember that Shirley is my cousin, and that I have known her much longer than you have. I think she is a bad deceitful girl—false to her heart's core; and, whatever the result of Major Stuart's application, I shall never hold any other opinion."

"If you were to see her," returned Ruby sorrowfully, dashing away her tears, too proud to show how much Alice's words wounded her, "you would change that opinion, Alice."

"Do you think I should have any faith in her fainting?" asked Alice contemptuously. "She is an accomplished actress; her long residence abroad taught her that; and, as for her tears, she can call them up at will."

"She has never cried at all," said Ruby sadly. "She just sits still and quiet, as pale as death, and speaks so gently and sweetly when she is spoken to, but with such a strange look in her eyes that I can hardly bear to meet it."

"It is a pity to let your tender heart be lacerated so foolishly," remarked Miss Fairholme. "But it is hardly to be expected that you would be able to fathom such a depth of depravity. People who are true themselves naturally believe in others' rectitude; but indeed your trust is singularly misplaced."

So saying, Alice took up a book which was lying on the gypsy table at her elbow, as a sign that she considered the conversation finished; and Ruby rose sorrowfully from her chair and stood looking down into the fire, with a mist between her eyes and its red glow.

"Then you will not come, Alice?" she said, after a long pause; and Miss Fairholme lifted her eyes from her book, with a puzzled expression, as if she did not understand.

"I beg your pardon?" she said, sweetly.

"You will not come with me?"

"Where, Ruby?"

"To see Shirley. It would only be kind of you, Alice dear, and I am sure it would make her less unhappy. She feels so much," Ruby added earnestly, "that this has brought sorrow on you, more especially because she fears——"

The girl hesitated and colored slightly.

"She is very good," Alice said scornfully. "What does she fear?"

"That you cared for Sir Hugh, and——"

"Her fears and her sympathy are both superfluous," said Miss Fairholme, taking up her book once more. "I will not see her, Ruby; so it is quite useless troubling me any more. I am not equal to any more of her scenes; her acting is too much for my nerves. My cousin has certainly missed her vocation."

"Alice, how cruel you are!" Ruby exclaimed, indignantly, as she turned away; and Alice laughed mockingly as she left the room, closing the door after her with a bang.

"I hope that will upset your nerves," she said, angrily, as she passed into the hall. "You may have nerves, Alice Fairholme, but you have no heart. Poor Shirley!"

She stood for a minute hesitating in the hall; the wintry dusk was gathering round, and it would soon be time for the lamps to be lighted. Just now the great blazing fire threw a red lurid light over the hall, which reached even the windows on either side of the hall door—broad low windows with wide cushioned window-seats, in one of which Ruby's quick eyes perceived a little crouching figure.

"Shirley!" she exclaimed, as she went toward the window; and Shirley turned her face toward her with a little smile which, to Ruby's eyes, seemed sadder than any tears.

She was sitting on the window-seat, resting her head against the pane of glass, and her lovely eyes so desolate and sorrowful were peering out into the gathering dusk beyond.

"What are you doing here, dear?" Ruby said, making her voice cheerful by a strong effort. "Is it not cold for you, Shirley?"

"Cold, Ruby! Feel how nice and warm my hands are."

Nice and warm! They were dry and hot and burning with fever as Ruby took them fondly in hers.

"I could not bear my room any longer," she said then, with a pitiful little attempt at playfulness. "The quiet worked on my nerves, I suppose, for I got restless; and I came here because—because——"

"The dog-cart has gone to the station,' said Ruby, gently, "and you would see it first from here."

(To be continued.)

Good in Everything.

I see in nature's open book
What goodly things to us are sent,
And in my neighbor's friendly look
What soon dispels my discontent;
These all awake a sense of good
That weans my heart from solitude.

We're not alone in this wide sphere,
We have companions who are just,
And friendly voices, far and near,
Whose gentle words we still may trust,
Yes! Every flower and spreading tree
Doth whisper: "We are made for thee."

I see the good that lies around,
I feel the joy that makes me free,
Heaven sendeth forth a happy sound,
That fills my soul with melody;
Beauty is spread o'er earth and sky,
The air breathes naught but harmony.

There is no winter in the heart
Of him who doth a useful deed;
Of what he gives he hath a part,
And this supplieth all his need;
Like to the husbandman who knows
His wealth increases as he sows.

MASKS OF HUMAN FLESH.

Dried Heads Used for Gods—Papuan Medicine Dances.

The most remarkable masks known to the museum collectors are the masks of human flesh, says a St. Louis Globe writer. The preservation of human heads apart from the bodies has been a very widespread custom, both in savage ages and among half-civilized peoples. But the mask composed of the flesh of a human face is peculiar to the islands of the South Seas and to some parts of South and Central America. The New Zealanders had a practice of preserving the entire head, either as a trophy or as a fetich, or perhaps both. The bones of the skull were removed, and the flesh impregnated with some embalming substance that dried it to the consistency of tough leather. Thus preserved, the head of a man of ordinary size shrank until no larger than a good-sized orange, but still retained most of the characteristic features of the countenance. Much rarer, however, than those embalmed heads are the human masks from the South Seas. A very peculiar specimen of one of these is seen in the British Museum. It is composed of the flesh of a chieftain killed in war, and is remarkable not so much for the preservation, nor for the care with which the work of embalming was done, as for the fact that the mask is heavily jewelled. The eyes are formed of pyrites, the nose is set with the delicate and beautiful shells found in the South Seas, and a curious mosaic of black obsidian and green tortoise runs in bands across the face, while here and there, with no apparent regularity, are set separate beads of colored stone. It is a true mask, the back part of the skull and the bones of the face having been removed, and the best authorities express the opinion that this mask was used as an idol, or on the face of a Mexican priest during the ceremonies pertaining to human sacrifice. Among savages religious, festive and social occasions are synonymous, and on most such masks are used either to hide the face from the deity or to furnish mirth for those gathered to see the sport. Many dances among the Papuans were entirely private and of a religious character, no strangers nor women being allowed to enter. The Papuan masks are highly colored in red, white and black bands across the face, figures appearing also in other parts of the countenance. The frame work is of wood, built up with cocoanut shell. The beard of the nut is used for hair and whiskers. On each side of the mouth projects a long boar's tooth, the points recurving toward the eyes. Sometimes these Papuan masks have protruding tongues, and occasionally from the mouth projects an arrow or fish, while more rarely the head of an animal is used either for nose or chin, or both. The mask is also used for the dak dak, or medicine dance. When a chieftain or person high in authority among Papuans becomes sick a man is hired to do the dak dak. He dresses himself in palm leaves, puts on a mask, performs certain incantations in private, begs from door to door and from every person he meets any small gift they choose to bestow as a reward for his services; then performs other unknown incantations, winding up with a visit to the sick man, who, the Papuans naively state, either gets well or dies, according to the faith he has in the medicine man and the wonderful mask.

The Class in Scripture.

A lady asked one of the children in her Sunday School class, "What was the sin of the Pharisees?" "Eating camels, ma'am," was the reply. The little girl had read that the Pharisees "strained at gnats and swallowed camels." "In what condition was the patriarch Job at the end of his life?" questioned a teacher of the stolid-looking boy at the foot of the class. "Dead," was the quiet response. "What is the outward and visible sign in baptism?" asked a lady of her Sunday School class. There was silence for some seconds, and then a girl broke in triumphantly with, "The baby, please, ma'am." "Do you know, mamma, I don't believe Solomon was so rich after all!" observed a sharp boy to his mother who prided herself on her orthodoxy. "My child!" she exclaimed in pious horror, "what does the Bible say?" "That's just it," he answered. "It says that 'Solomon slept with his fathers.' Now, surely, if he had been rich he'd have had a bed to himself." A teacher in trying to explain to her scholars the meaning of repentance, used this illustration: "Suppose a bad boy were to steal an orange, and his good mother should catch him with it, and take him by the hand gently and tell him how wicked it is, and how very, very grieved she was; don't you think, now, that the little boy ought to feel sorry?" One of the scholars eagerly replied: "Yes, mum." "And why, Marmaduke?" "'Cause." "Because, why, Marmaduke?" "Because he hadn't et the orange befo' his ma cotch him and tuck it away from him!"—Chambers' Journal.

Nearly all the Washington churches were supplied yesterday by women. The International Council was opened at 3 o'clock by a sermon from Rev. Annie Shaw, which was a masterly effort. The Opera House would not hold the people who came to hear her, hundreds being turned away. Clara Hoffman addressed an overflow meeting in the Foundry Church.

The portraits of Chief Justices Armour and Galt are to be painted by Mr. Berthon and will shortly adorn the walls of Osgoode Hall.

NOVEL FEMININE FASHIONS.

(Cousin Kate's Contribution.)

In the spring a woman's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of clothes, and as Eastertide draws near she consults the calendar rather than the thermometer in arranging her wardrobe. It is sadly true that not infrequently, instead of Easter sunshine, a cold drizzle has effectually dampened the hopes of womankind in reference to appearing in spring freshness and finery on that day of days; and at other times "a frost, killing frost," has flushed pretty faces with disappointment (and, alas! pretty noses with cold). So that, instead of wearing the new raiment which blooms in the spring and naturally befits the feast of the resurrection, disgusted femininity has had to sing its Easter anthems clad in Christmas clothes.

But these disappointments fade out of recollection before another year rolls around. Hope springs eternal in woman's breast, and in spite of all prior discouragements she makes her preparations next time with as entire a confidence in the benevolent designs of the clerk of the weather, as if she'd positive knowledge that a special consignment of summer airs and sunshine had been shipped to her address, to arrive that day.

In all the fashions for this season of 1888—and their name is legion—there is but one inflexible rule, but one unalterable law, the law of loveliness. Therefore, let every woman make herself as beautiful as she can according to her lights and her pocketbook, and however this desirable result is reached, let her rest assured that so far as "being in the fashion" goes she's entirely safe from criticism.

The gowns which are being finished off for Easter Sunday are mostly of woollen material, either entirely or in part. And a truly marvellous variety of patterns are shown in this fabric.

The shops are literally full of these stuffs and the prices at which they are offered are notably reasonable.

Cashmeres seem to have taken a new lease of popularity. These plaid colors are combined either with a woollen striped, plaided or figured material, or with any kind of silk that the wearer fancies. The underskirt is made very plainly. No pleatings are required at the foot. Frequently a few broad, flat folds are laid from the waistband to the hem, to fill in a space left exposed by looping the drapery very high above point. Polonaises of the plain goods look well over underskirts of the fancy stuff, which is then used for draperies or revers on waist and sleeves.

There are numerous pretty mixed cheviots. These are also double width, so that in buying them one need get only one-half the quantity required of single goods.

Very pretty checked and striped surahs have been offered this week at two New York shops. They are in black and white, blue and white, browns, darkest greens and mahogany and terra-cotta shades. These silks do not crease easily and are cool and light to wear. They combine very nicely with the plain cashmeres.

Where two colors are desired in a suit the following go well together: Gobelin blue and cream or suede; dark green and reseda (mignonette green); green and copper shades; brown looks well with chamois, and grays with white or cream.

Faintly shaded stripes and "invisible" checks are suitable for tailor-made dresses. Short cloth jackets will be in great favor. Many of these are in some dark color and are cut to hang open in front, showing a white or light colored cloth waistcoat underneath which buttons up to the throat and is trimmed with braid. White cloth jackets are likely to be as popular this season as red and suede have been in former times. But they are not a good investment for a woman who wants to get much wear out of her spring garment, as they soil quickly, besides being too conspicuous for most occasions in town. In the country they will look charming.

Very pretty little mantles are designed for spring. Some of them are shaped exactly like a dress body, cut with little tabs in front and a small coat-tail at the back. They are sleeveless and have epaulets. These may be made of silk, grenadine or net, and should be more or less covered with beads and fringe and dangling ornaments, with ribbons fastening them in front at throat and waist.

A Romantic Commercial Career.

A remarkable career was brought to a close by the death of Mr James Morton, in a private home in Glasgow, on Monday morning. He was closely connected with the disastrous failure of the City of Glasgow Bank in 1878. Commencing life as a farm boy, he afterwards sold milk from house to house in the streets of Glasgow, and subsequently opened a stationery shop in the same city. After failing, in 1847 he became associated with several gentlemen in the Australian trade, and went heavily into New Zealand land speculations. Immediately after the bank stopped payment, James Morton's failure was intimated with liabilities of £3,461,034. The City Bank had advanced him £2,173,000. For many years Mr. Morton had financed the affairs of the bank, and it was in return for this service that he exercised the privilege of drawing whatever money he needed for his own operations. After his disgrace in connection with the bank failure he returned for a time to his original occupation, and again drove a milk-cart through the streets of Glasgow. But misfortune continued to follow him, and before his death he was reduced to a condition of extreme poverty. The story of Mr. Morton's career is one of the most romantic chapters of modern commercial history.

Revolution in Leather Tanning.

A newly discovered process of tanning leather promises to revolutionize the business. By its manipulations hide can be tanned in two hours and a half, where it requires six to eight weeks by the old method. The leather tanned by the process is soft and pliable as it was previous to the soaking process. Another remarkable fact about the method is the small amount of room required to perform a large amount of work. As much work can be done by this method in a building twenty by twenty-five feet as can be done under the old process on a plot of several acres.

THE WAYS OF BOYS.

M. Quad Believes in Letting Them Learn Some Things by Experience.

I can look back down the lane of the past and see where my father failed to hit the nail on the head in managing his boys, albeit no one can doubt he did what he thought for the best. There comes a day in every boy's life when he wants to be a pirate. It looks silly to us grown folks, but that boy is in dead earnest. It is no way to grab him by the collar and rush him to the woodshed and bang him around and growl:

"Want to be a pirate, do you? Want to go around cutting throats and scuttling ships, eh? Want to have a rendezvous up some lagoon and boss a band of Spanish cutthroats? Now, boy, I'm going to lick you within an inch of your life!"

If my boy caught the pirate fever I should call him in and kindly say:

"Now, James, I did want to make a lawyer of you, but pirating is the next thing to it and I am not going to scold. If you bend your energies to the task you will climb to the top and become a boss pirate. I should like to buy you a Cunarder and start you off in first-class shape, but, unfortunately for us both, I am poor. The best I can do is to give you a dollar in cash, and you may take along the butcher knife, my old pistol and most anything else you think will come handy. Write to us as often as you can, boy, letting us know how many treasure galloons you have captured to date, and how the general crops promise in your section, and when adversity overtakes you, and when you want $6 or $7 to pay your fare back to the old roof tree, don't hesitate to telegraph to me."

If the boy attempted to back out after this talk I should rather insist upon his going. If he could be induced to travel off about ten miles, and to put in a night in a fence corner or a hay stack, he would return next day so changed that you would have to look at him twice to know him. He'd find such a difference between commanding a pirate ship in his mind and crowding up to a rail fence to keep the shivers off that a new page in the book of life would be open to him.

If I had a boy who had read of green islands and wrecked sailors until he could shut his eyes and see parrots and monkeys and cocoanuts and waving palms—if he had firmly made up his mind that he never could be happy until cast away on an island and reduced to a goat skin overcoat, I should take him out behind the barn and say:

"My son, I see you are not happy; you evidently hunger for something which my limited means will not permit me to tote home. I think you want to be wrecked. Very well. There's the river and an old skiff, and you can find an island a few miles down. Get two or three pieces of tarred rope, a plug of navy tobacco and a fish hook and go on with the wrecking business. If you like it come home at the end of a week and I'll send you to the Pacific, where the mosquitoes are bigger and the cannibals more numerous."

If the boy went I should expect him back next morning—certainly at the end of two days, and when he got back the subject should be tabooed forever.

No father should be surprised if his boy develops a yearning to become a mighty nimrod. There is something highly fascinating in the idea of knocking over buffaloes, lions, tigers, elephants and giraffes, and of successful encounters with alligators and boa constrictors. It makes one's mouth water to think of juicy antelope steaks and buffalo sirloin, and the boy who doesn't want to be a hunter must be lame or blind. When signs begin to crop out the father should be ready. Take the boy out and sit down on a log with him and say:

"James, it's a burning shame for me to keep you around home here and spoil your whole future. I came across a bar of lead, half a pound of salt and a loaf of bread which you secreted in the cat bin as a starter for going west. There's no need of any slyness, my son. I want you to go. I shall be proud of you if you become a great hunter. I'll lend you the shotgun and two horse blankets and a frying pan and help you carry 'em to the nearest piece of woods. If you'll stay there three days and nights then I'll fit you out and send you to the Black Hills."

How long would he stay? He'd be almost certain to come sneaking into the back door before bed time, but if he put it off until morning so much the better. He'd have the whole night in which to turn pale, look about with wild eyes, shiver at every sound, hold his breath at the hoot of an owl, and to promise himself over and over again:

"Just let me live till morning and I hope to die if I ever leave home again!"—Detroit Free Press.

A Bishop's Matrimonial Motto.

Bishop Thomas, of Salisbury, was married four times, and on the last occasion he had this motto put inside the wedding ring:

If I survive
I'll make them five.

In one of his visitation charges he gave his clergy an account of his method of dealing with the various ladies, and said, "Why, should my present and fourth wife die, I will take another, and I have a presentiment that I shall outlive her. Perhaps you don't know the art of changing your wives. I'll tell you how I do. I am called a very good husband, and so I am, for I never contradict them. But, don't you know that the want of contradiction is fatal to women? If you contradict them, that circumstance alone is exercise and health to all women. But give them their own way, and they will languish, pine, and become lethargic for want of this exercise, and you will soon be quit of them."

Out of the Question.

Old lady—Where do you keep your unbleached cotton?

Parenthetical floor-walker—Walk this way, madame.

Old lady—Land sakes! I couldn't walk that way if he was to give me the whole store!

THE BANSHEE'S WARNING.

A Curious Creature that Told a Man of His Mother's Death.

Michael Phelan, the vigilant night watchman at the Planters' House, tells some queer stories of his experiences in Ireland before he decided to emigrate:

"Once I saw a banshee. It was many years ago, in King's County, Ireland, about forty miles from Dublin. During the summer months there the twilight is very long, and late one afternoon, when the sun had gone down, I happened to walk over to the farm of a man named Michael Burns. Well, as we stood and talked my friend suddenly said: 'Mike, do you want to see a banshee?' Of course I did, and when I looked where he pointed, sure enough, there in the lane, creeping along near the hedge was a wee bit of a thing not more than three feet high. It looked like a little girl, only its hair, which was long and yellow, fell down its back clear to the ground, and as it crept along it whimpered and moaned just like a child in pain. My friend looked very grave, saying: 'That's a family banshee, and I'm afraid some of my relations are going to be sick.'

"Pretty soon I left, but not before a neighbor had come riding up, and told my friend to make haste as his mother had been taken very ill. The next day I learned that the poor woman had died before her son reached her. Oh, the banshees are queer things, and they never let any one come near them. Another man I knew came across one sitting in a cornfield, near the fence. When he suddenly appeared, it ran out of sight among the corn, but it dropped its comb from its yellow hair, and the man picked it up and put it in his pocket. That night the banshee came near the house and whined so piteously that the man dropped the comb out of the window. The banshee then left, and when a search was made next morning it was found that the comb had disappeared, too."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Peace by Compulsion.

Fred. D——, 5 years old, had to learn a verse to recite at Sunday school. His verse was: "Blessed are the peacemakers." He did not exactly understand what it meant, and his mother explained it to him, telling him that whenever he saw two boys quarrelling or fighting he must be a little peacemaker and try to stop them. The next night as he was being undressed he said: "Mamma, I was a little peacemaker to-day." "Were you?" said his mother: "how?" "I saw two little boys fighting in the street and I stopped them." "That's a good boy," said the mother, giving him a kiss; "and did you part them?" "Why, I just ran up and fired stones at them till they stopped fighting and ran away."

Absent Minded United States Men.

They say that General Lew Wallace is so absent minded that he sugars his boiled eggs and salts and peppers his coffee. Rufus Choate, however, knew a man who was so absent minded that after declaring that he had left his watch home he deliberately took it out of his pocket to see whether he had time to go home and get it. Still the best case of this kind is where a bank cashier abstracts $10,000 without knowing it and then goes to Canada to find out what the directors are making a fuss about.—New York Herald.

A WELL-GROOMED GIRL.

How a Clever Mamma Carried Her Delicate Daughter Through a Washington Season.

"There are few things in the world tougher for a woman than the Washington season," said a Senator. "You remember Miss Seabright, do you not?"

"The girl who married the Boston lawyer last year? Yes, I remember."

"Well, Miss Seabright was not tough. She was willowy and fragile—just the girl for Washington to kill off in one season. And her mother knew it and that knowledge is what saved Miss Seabright. She brought the young lady here to put her through a course of Washington society—to have her see it, and it see her, and maybe the old lady—not so very old either—had some idea of the Boston denouement; who knows? At any rate she took the girl—Chloe, I think she was called—and watched her all winter as an anxious nurse would watch a patient. She sent her aunt into society with her and she did the heavy work at home. She kept everybody still and compelled favorable and soothing conditions so that Chloe could sleep till 12. Then she lifted her up from bed and carried her to the bath and bathed her, permitting the girl to make no exertion herself. She rubbed her with dry towels, clothed her, fed her with nourishing food and in the afternoon made the grand rounds as her escort. At 5 o'clock she brought her charge home, fed her and put her carefully to bed, watching at her bedside. An hour before the time of setting out for the night's rounds she woke her, gave her a bath and prepared her for the exertion. She kept that girl alive that winter by grooming her constantly with exactly the same care that Sullivan's trainer bestows on him before a prize-fight, or a jockey gives a race-horse of Epsom Downs. And in the spring, when everybody else was jaded out and sick and ready to drop, Chloe was as spry as a cricket, though without strength enough to refuse Cartwright. That's just the way all mothers ought to manage their society girls."—Washington Special to the New York Mail and Express.

Easter Flowers of Fashion.

Easter bonnets and hats are generally of straw and usually trimmed with ribbons of silk or velvet and small clusters of spring flowers. A pretty fancy is to have a little bunch of violets tied loosely together, with green stems showing, caught among the loops. Other bonnets are made with a full ruching of lace, either black or colored, forming the front of the snug-fitting little capote, while the crown is of loosely folded silk; soft rosettes of the lace and a cluster of flowers trim the top. These bonnets, and all bonnets as well, are worn with or without strings, at the fancy of the wearer. And any kind of string that is becoming will be equally desirable. A plump and pleasing "moon-faced" girl will find that a trim little "bridle" of velvet, fastened with pretty pins, looks best under her round chin. A woman with an oval Madonna face will frame it in folds of soft lace, tied in a large loose bow, a bunch of little narrow ribbons fluttering out midway between her left ear and the dimple on her chin will best suit another style of beauty, and so on through an infinite variety.

A good way to insure having a dress body that fits perfectly is to either match your plain goods with a jersey waist, or, if that is not possible, buy a light-colored one and have it dyed, then use this for the foundation, which you can trim as you choose to correspond with the skirts of your gown. This plan is especially convenient for stout figures, that always present more difficulties to the unskilful or inexperienced dressmaker than those of slenderer proportions.

Gingham and lawn dresses for little 3-year-old girls are made with yokes, belted at the waist line and have full skirts of two and a half breadths.

Veils of grenadine or silk tissue, dotted with chenille, are worn. Corded pique comes in delicate blues, pinks and browns, as well as cream tints.

Transparent hats and bonnets will be worn by and bye made of black, white and colored figured and dotted lace. A novel hat of black straw has the entire top of the crown removed. The opening is wreathed with small roses and foliage, and two or three thorny stems cross from side to side. The wide brim of black fancy straw is lined with quillings of lace and caught up on one side by a cluster of the flowers.

A Novel Ball.

As yet we haven't had a rose ball here, but undoubtedly after Easter will see one. You must know that a rose ball doesn't permit the presence of a man, and is intended for unmarried girls. Fifty is usually the number invited, and of the fifty twenty-five are selected to masquerade as gentlemen. The costume is quite proper, for a ball skirt is worn, the touch of masculinity being in the pink satin waistcoat and coat, the high collar and shirt front. The description sounds rather tame, but the reality is larky beyond everything. Fifty of the young women of to-day can make a livelier ball than a thousand of the men. The dancing is usually unique, especially after supper, and it is said the knowledge that some of the young dears display when they make love in the corner or the conservatory is like the jewels worn by Tom Moore's immaculate young women, "rich and rare." That there will be little left for the men to teach the roses is true; one knowing young woman can educate the other forty-nine, and so they cannot longer be called ingenue.—Boston Letter in Chicago Tribune.

From the Thornbury Standard.

Division Court was held here on Wednesday of last week as reported in our last issue. There were quite a number of cases. The legal fraternity was augmented by the addition in the person of Mr. W. H. Wright, a student in Mr. Pollard's office, Meaford. Mr. Wright created a very favorable impression here by his tact and ability shown in a case, Johnson vs. McKenzie. Mr. Wright has had some experience in Peterborough, Mr. Gamon had a great many cases, and Mr. Wright is looked upon as his compeer in Division Court cases. He is an affable offhanded young man, and we predict for him many more cases in our Division Courts in future ..... Mr. Wright is a son of Mr. John Wright, of or near Flesherton.

THE BRIDGE DISASTER.

A Passenger Train Plunged Into a Roaring Torrent—The Engine and Three Cars Submerged—Over a Dozen Lives Lost—A score Injured, Many Fatally.

A last (Thursday) night's New Hampton despatch gives the following fuller particulars of the accident: A terrible accident occurred early this morning about four miles west of this town, on the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, by which at least a dozen persons lost their lives and from 15 to 20 were injured. The train, which left Chicago at 11 30 yesterday forenoon and was due here at 2 31 this morning, passed nearly on time, and when about four miles west plunged into a creek, the bridge over which had been washed away. The creek was swollen by the immense amount of water which had been running off for the past few days, and in addition a gorge of ice was formed, which previous to the arrival of the train carried away a portion of the bridge. There was nothing to show that there was danger ahead, and the train plunged into the swollen stream while running at full speed. The engine and three coaches went into the creek and were immediately submerged in the torrent of water which overflowed the banks. A scene of the wildest confusion followed, and those of the train crew and passengers who escaped death or injury were immediately called into service to relieve the drowning or pinioned passengers. It was with great difficulty that the passengers could be reached, owing to the rushing of the waters through the car windows. Those who were rescued from the smoking car, which was almost entirely submerged, were taken from the windows, some being maimed to such an extent that they were powerless to help themselves, while others were nearly drowned before the rescuers could reach them. Six dead bodies have been taken out from the wreck, and three more are known to be underneath the debris, through which the water is madly pouring, and it is difficult to reach them. It is also stated that the engineer and fireman were instantly killed or were caught in the cab and drowned before aid could reach them, but the confusion and excitement is so great that it is difficult to secure reliable information. In addition to the passengers known to be killed, from fifteen to twenty have been rescued that are more or less seriously injured. A number are so dangerously hurt that it is feared they cannot possibly recover. As soon as a trainman who escaped injury could be spared he was dispatched to this station and a relief train was telegraphed for from Mason City. Telegrams for relief were also sent to Charles City and other nearby places, but it was not until several hours after the accident that a train arrived with physicians to care for the injured and additional helping hands to aid in rescuing those confined in the wreck. The names of the killed and injured have not yet been obtained.

DROPPED NINE THOUSAND FEET.

The Great Jump Made by Prof. E. D. Hogan.

A Jackson, Mich., despatch says: Prof. E. D. Hogan did his long-contemplated "drop act" from a balloon with a parachute at 11.05 o'clock this morning. The first attempt was a failure. The second attempt was a great success. The "chute" hung from the outside of the balloon and the jump was made after the air ship had settled at an elevation of about 9,000 feet. At the moment when it was stationary in the air the daring man swung himself off from the balloon with the parachute closed. For 500 feet he fell like an iron ball. Then the "chute" caught the air, inflated and he was safe; but he did not come down as fast as he had calculated. He remained apparently suspended in the air for some moments and then sank to the eastward. It was 11.05 when he left the earth. Five minutes later he made the drop, and inside of three minutes he landed in an open field.

The Prairie Province.

The Queen's hotel at Portage la Prairie, was considerably damaged by fire last night.

The carpenters and millwrights employed on the new mill at Keewatin are on strike.

At Keewatin, on Tuesday, at Mrs. Hanna's boarding house, a number of Swedes, under the influence of liquor, began quarrelling, when one Peter Newburg drew a revolver, shooting Alfred Hulburg in the head, and, firing again, hit him in the fleshy part of the back. The victim may recover.

At a meeting of the Port Arthur Board of Trade, held yesterday, a resolution was passed supporting the O. M. & W. Railway project. The scheme is not receiving any encouragement in Winnipeg, except among the old guard Tories. What Winnipeggers want now is direct conection with Duluth, where there is plenty of elevator room.

Provincial debentures to the extent of $8,400 have been purchased out of the sinking fund of the city.

Attorney-General Martin was tendered a banquet at Portage la Prairie to-night to celebrate the discontinuance of disallowance and the abrogation of monopoly.

The Premier has gone to his home at Crystal City for a few days.

Over twenty carloads of potatoes were shipped south by Major Lewis, of Albert Lea, this morning. They will be taken to Chicago and other markets for seed. Large quantities are being taken to the United States markets, as Manitoba potatoes are eagerly taken by buyers on the other side.

On the train last night were 126 immigrants. The majority of them were good, substantial Ontario farmers, who will settle at various points throughout the Province.

A verdict of wilful murder has been found against Jas. Fletcher, who stabbed George Matheson at Binscarth.

John A. Tees & Co., wholesale grocers, have failed. Liabilities, $50,000; assets unknown.

The seventeenth anniversary of the Paris Commune was celebrated on Saturday night at Clarendon Hall, New York. The feature was a speech by Johann Most. Most glorified the Commune, and said the Commune meant down with States, Governments, religion and tyrants. There was no great enthusiasm at the meeting.

CANADIAN LEPERS.

The Patients at Tracadie Lazaretto Being Slowly Reduced by Death—New Cases Discovered—Escapes to the States.

An Ottawa despatch says: The lazaretto at Tracadie, the most mournful spot on the American continent, possesses for all who are acquainted with its history a painful interest. To such it will be a matter for congratulation that according to the latest reports the mysterious malady usually termed leprosy, which only affects people in a circumscribed district in New Brunswick, is slowly but surely being eradicated. When the lazaretto was first established the number of inmates was forty; it has now been reduced to seventeen. Eight of these are males and nine females. Dr. Smith, the inspecting physician, says that during the year three patients succumbed to the disease or escaped to the United States, and three new cases, all females, were admitted. Of the latter one came from Tracadie and two from adjoining parishes.

Hearing of suspected cases at Point Marcillea, a few miles from Carsquet and about thirty from Tracadie, the doctor visited the locality and found two young persons afflicted with leprosy in its earlier stages. One of these has since been admitted to the lazaretto and the other will soon follow. The doctor mentions two girls in Tracadie who will soon have to take up their abode in this hopeless, gloomy ante-room of death, forever to be shut out from life, with all its interests and brightness.

Dr. Smith speaks of two cases, in one of which a cure has been effected and in the other the patient is slowly improving, and an ultimate cure will probably be reached. "I attribute these recoveries," says the doctor, "to the excellent hygienic influences of the institution before the disease had made any serious inroad on vigorous constitutions. Had these patients remained at home in poverty, I have no doubt but they would now be confirmed lepers." "No words of mine," he adds, "can do justice to the unremitting care bestowed night and day upon these poor sufferers by the ladies in charge of the institution. The most perfect neatness and cleanliness, good ventilation and attention to hygienic laws, render the institution home-like, relieve the diseased of much of their wretchedness, and make a visit to the lazaretto, notwithstanding the gloom surrounding it, more pleasant than otherwise."

Our neighbors across the line will hear with uneasiness of the escape of patients into their territory.

MRS. KEEFER AT WASHINGTON.

A Tiff With Mrs. Ashton Dilke Over the Cigarette Question.

A Washington despatch says: The International Women have wound up the week with great enthusiasm, and with victory emblazoned on their banners. Their meetings have been overwhelmingly successful in the cleverness of the speakers, the harmony of the proceedings and the multitude of deeply interested listeners. Many prominent people have given them encouragement and extended hospitality in many ways. Mrs. (Senator) Stanford has paid for a box all the week and has attended most of the meetings.

There are not a few quarrels brewing among the dear sisters, and as a rule the prettiest and most attractive women are the targets. Mrs. Keefer came in for her share of abuse, because she wears the becoming University costume, which makes her all the more bewitching. They say she does it for effect, and she does not deny the soft impeachment.

Mrs. Dilke and Mrs. Keefer are not in love with each other. A tilt that took place between them in the Riggs House parlor is the talk to-day. Mrs. Keefer is dead against liquors and tobacco, while Mrs. Dilke does not object to either. Mrs. Dilke walked up to Mrs. Keefer and said in her half lisp, half soft society drawl:

"Mrs. Keefer, do tell me if they can possibly be as rabid on the subject of smoking and taking a little sherry for the stomach's sake in Canada as they are in this country?"

"Even more so," replied Mrs. Keefer laconically and eyeing the little London lady sharply.

"Oh, but don't you know," went on the enchanting-tongued young widow Dilke, "we all want our wine for dinner over our way, and we would not know how to do without it, my dear, and do 't you know in many of our loveliest London circles many elegant ladies puff a cigarette or two after dinner and nothing is thought of it. If these are crimes I must plead guilty to both. I must really say I do enjoy my cigarette after a meal."

"This doesn't make it cleanly or good," responded Mrs. Keefer, with her long, pointed noise turned ceilingward, and she walked away without saying good-bye, even.

Wedded to Their Idols.

A Salt Lake City despatch says: The Mormon semi-annual conference opened here yesterday with a light attendance. Elder Seymour B. Young, in opening the proceedings, called upon the people to pay their tithing and obey the priesthood ordinances of the church. He came out flat-footed for polygamy. Apostle Lorenzi Snow, who recently served a term of imprisonment for polygamy, called on the saints to be patient and true and see the coming of Christ for their relief. Elder Jacob Gates said: "Zion will triumph and many of our enemies will lick the dust at our feet. We will never give up until we achieve victory. Angus Cannon, in his benediction, called on the Lord to confound "our enemies and bless Israel in affliction."

Where the Shoe Pinches.

"You ought not to have punished the boy so severely," he said, reprovingly, to the woman. "The dog belongs to a neighbor, and, besides, tying a kettle to a dog's tail is not such a wicked thing for a boy to do."

"The kettle belonged to me," said the woman, still mad.—New York Sun.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT

Unrestricted Reciprocity.

The following is the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright (with the division on the question in the House of Commons), after having been discussed for nearly three weeks

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted); that it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and Unrestricted Reciprocity of trade therewith.

The division list was as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Amyot, Armstrong, Bain (Wentworth), Barron, Brchard, Bernier, Borden, Bourassa, Bowman, Brien, Burdett, Cartwright (Sir Richard), Casey, Casgrain, Charlton, Chouinard, Davies, De St Georges, Dessaint, Doyon, Ebenhauer, Edgar, Ellis, Fiset, Fisher, Geoffrion, Gillmor, Godbout Guay, Hale, Holton, Innes, Jones, Kirk, Landerkin, Lang, Langelier (Montmorency), Langelier (Quebec), Laurier, Lister, Livingston, Lovitt, Macdonald (Huron), McIntyre, McMillan (Huron), McMullen, Mills (Bothwell), Mitchell, Mulock, Paterson (Brant), Perry, Platt, Prefontaine, Rinfret, Robertson, Rowand, Ste. PROUD OF HER HUSBAND'S PLUCK.

Mrs. Harralson, of Atlanta, Likes a Man Who Can Use a Whip.

An Atlanta, Ga., despatch says: Frank Harralson, State Librarian of Georgia, to-day cowhided Abe Fry, a well-known jeweller. The affair grew out of a business transaction. Stepping into Fry's store with the whip and a revolver, Harralson exclaimed: "You have both said and printed in an interview a set of infernal lies, and I expect to be revenged for it. Take this, and this, and this!"

Fry made no resistance. Subsequently, as Harralson was proceeding up the street, at the gate of the City Bank building, he was stopped by a messenger from his wife with the following note:

DEAR FRANK,—Allow me to congratulate you. I have just this moment heard that you have cowhided Fry. Come home as soon as you can, I am anxious to see you.—YOUR LOVING WIFE.

Dr. Charles Edward Wilson, Chief Inspector of Training Colleges and Schools in Scotland, died this residence in Edinburgh on the 17th inst. Dr. Wilson almost completed the 40th year of his career as an inspector of schools and died at the age of 73 years.

Rev. Dr. Somerville, the evangelist, returned to Glasgow on Monday, March 23rd, after an absence of six months. During that time he has been engaged in laborious evangelistic work in Bohemia, Moravia, Transylvania, Hungary, Servia, and has even reached Kischeff in South Russia.

Colonel James Ross Farquharson, of Invercauld, Aberdeenshire, died in London on March 17th. Deceased was 54 years of age. He was for several years in the Scots Fusilier Guards, and served in the Crimean campaign, but retired from the army in 1859 with the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

Rev. Dr. W. S. Wilson, Episcopalian Bishop of Glasgow and Galloway, died at Ayr on March 18, aged 87. He had been holding confirmation services throughout his diocese, and caught a chill while waiting on the station platform at Kilmarnock. He was consecrated bishop in 1859.

The Lord Advocate has introduced a Bill in Parliament to amend the law of bail. It proposes to make all offences bailable, excepting only murder and treason. The bail is to be fixed by any magistrate having jurisdiction, and is to be of such an amount as will ensure appearance at the trial. If either the prosecutor or prisoner is dissatisfied with the judge's decision regarding bail then they may take an appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

FASHIONABLE DRESS IN 1788.

The Gorgeous Apparel of One Hundred Years Ago.

How gorgeously people dressed a hundred years ago! Not ladies only, but gentlemen as well. Open the London Times for January 19th, 1788, and you may read the description of a grand ball given the evening before in honor of the birthday of Queen Charlotte, the wife of George III. Here is the description of the costumes worn by a few of the leading personages:

The Queen, an orange and black gown and petticoat, richly ornamented with velvet and black lace.

Princess Royal, a lilac and silver gown and petticoat; the trimmings of purple and silver foil elegantly embroidered to correspond with the dress. Her shoes of the most beautiful workmanship; a silver chain worked round the quarters, grounded all over with elegant embroidered knots, and a large diamond in the middle of them.

Lady Charlotte Bertie, a white dress, trimmed down the front with gold spangles and stones of prodigious lustre; the petticoat of crape elegantly trimmed; the crown of the cap in points trimmed with a beautiful blonde lace, and differed from any other in the drawing-room. Her flowing tresses were dressed in a style of peculiar neatness.

The King. His Majesty was dressed in a cinnamon-colored coat, most beautifully embroidered with gold, silver and diamonds; the lining of the same color. The waistcoat, a sapphire blue satin, embroidered as the coat. The design was in the highest style of elegance—wreaths of laurel executed in gold, and bound together with a string of diamonds, enclosed on each side with rows of diamonds intermixed with gold.

The Prince of Wales, in a most magnificent suit. The coat and breeches of a cocquelicot, or poppy-colored satin, embroidered all over with silver and colored spangles and paste beads enriched with an applique. The waistcoat and cuffs of the coat were silver tissue, embroidered in the same manner as the coat. The buckles, silver of the Orleans pattern, covered with large gold spangles in the highest taste and elegance.

Duke of Queensberry, as usual, in the dernier gout, with all the nouveautes that fancy and fashion could furnish, yet in a style of neatness truly elegant. The coat of a beautiful variegated velvet, appearing in some lights black, in others purple and green. The waistcoat with white satin, embroidered with a border like the coat, in gold and silver, with rich clusters of diamonds.

The Hon. Mr. Villiers, the embroidery peculiarly elegant; the design of the happiest effect. A branch of oak leaves with acorns, entwined with a wreath of myrtle executed in gold and green foils, silver and pink, with beautiful bouquets of the finest paste. The coat was of velvet fond a Grille; the surface black, the ground a mixture of blue and straw. The waistcoat of white satin embroidered as the coat. The tout ensemble displayed a style of exquisite taste and originality of invention.

Mr. Pitt, a neat dress of black, green and pink figured velvet, embroidered with gold and silver spangles, and wreaths of silk flowers.

Fortune's Freaks with Twins.

Some suggestive figures are given in the report of the Registrar-General of births, deaths and marriages in Scotland for the year 1885, just issued. During the year in question, 1,437 women in Scotland bore more than one child at a birth, of which 1,423 were twin cases, and 11 triplet. The number of mothers bearing children during the year was 124,649, of whom one in every 88 bore twins, and one in every 8,903 bore triplets.

On inquiry into the occupation of the fathers of the twins, it is found that in 331 cases they were workmen of various kinds, as carpenters, masons, plasterers, smiths, etc.; in 300 the occupation was that of a farmer, steward, plowman, laborer or those connected with the working of land; in 114 cases mining was the work of the fathers; 10 were fishermen or seamen; 79 merchants and shopkeepers, as grocers, bakers, etc.; 75 were engineers or connected with such work; 68 were clerks, travellers, agents, etc.; 65 were factory hands; 64 grooms, carters and others connected with horses; in 30 cases only the male parent belonged to one of the various "learned professions;" 25 were shoemakers or saddlers; a like number being kotel-keepers, brewers, waiters, etc.; 23 were tailors; 21 soldiers or policemen; 4 were watchmakers and 3 printers, while in 86 cases the births were illegitimate and the vocation of the fathers not known.

It certainly seems a strange irony of fate that twins so often appear in families least able to give them a cordial welcome.—St. James' Gazette.

A Victim of Hair Dyes.

A Louisville, Ky., despatch says: A singular case of insanity was discovered here this morning. Lou Starr was found in her room seated among broken mirrors, crockery and pictures. Her hair fell about her shoulders to her waist, as white as snow, though she is only a young woman. An officer was summoned and she was taken to the station a raving maniac. During the past two years she has dyed her hair and the poison gradually entered her blood and drove her to madness.

A Family "Secret."

Mrs. Hobson (to Bobby, who is out calling with his mother)—This is the first time you have seen my baby, isn't it, Bobby?

Bobby (critically)—Yes, ma'am, and I think it's quite nice.

Mrs. Hobson—Nice, Bobby! Why, it is lovely!

Bobby—Ma says it's the homeliest child she ever saw.—Epoch.

An Eavesdropper's Reward.

Edwin (suddenly, after a long pause)—Darling

Angelina—Yes, darling.

Edwin—Nothing, darling. Only darling, darling.

Bilious old gentleman feels quite sick.—Punch.

The Tender Buds of Hope.

Tom—I notice your orange tree in the conservatory hasn't a flower on it.

Effie (in her tenth season)—No, Tom; I have tried all kinds of treatment, but the orange tree will not blossom for me.

MAN'S FIRST MATE.

Various Stories Concerning the First Woman.

Woman's first appearance has been a fruitful subject for the legend-mongers. According to S. Baring Gould, there was an extraordinary mystic named Antoinette Bourignon, who held that Adam's stomach contained a clear fluid, like water in a crystal bowl, in which tiny eggs developed themselves like bubbles in wine, and when he strongly desired companions he deposited some of these eggs, which hatched out Eve. The Phœnician myth of creation is found in the story of Pygmalion and Galatea. There the first woman was carved by the first man out of ivory, and then endowed with life by Aphrodite. The Greek theory of the creation of woman, according to Hesiod, was that Zeno, as a cruel jest, ordered Vulcan to make woman out of clay, and then induced the various gods and goddesses to invest the clay doll with all their worst qualities, the result being a lovely thing, with a witchery of mien, refined craft, eager passion, love of dress, treacherous manners and shameless mind. The Scandinavians say that as Odin, Vili and Ve, the three sons of Bor, were walking along the seabeach they found two sticks of wood, one of ash and one of elm. Sitting down, the gods shaped man and woman out of these sticks, whittling the woman from the elm and calling her Elma.

One of the strangest stories touching the origin of woman is that told by the Madagascarenes. In so far as the creation of man goes the legend is not unlike that related by Moses, only that the fall came before Eve arrived. After the man had eaten of the forbidden fruit he became affected with a boil on the leg, out of which, when it burst, came a beautiful girl. The man's first thought was to throw her to the pigs, but he was commanded by a messenger from Heaven to let her play among the diggings until she was of marriageable age, then to make her his wife. He did so, called her Bahoura, and she became the mother of all races of men.

The American Indians' myths relative to Adam and Eve are numerous and entertaining. Some traditions trace back our first parents to white and red Maoze; another is that man, searching for a wife, was given the daughter of the King of the Muskrats, who, on being dipped into a neighboring lake, became a woman.

Poor first mother! For untold centuries she has been twitted for her primal share in the world's cares and punishments. But whether the product of a pimple or of a divinely-vivified rib, the paradox remains that she who is the truest daughter of Eve has never a lack of admiring slaves.

The Conscientious Newspaper Man.

It is my experience that a conscientious newspaper man will do his work—interviewing included—about right if the man who has the news to give will only et him. Reporters don't wilfully and maliciously misquote talkers and misstate facts, as they are so generally credited with doing, and I find that the best plan to pursue in giving material for publication is to state the facts clearly and let the reporter do the dressing up. These fellows who always insist on being reported verbatim, and who must dictate the text of every item they furnish, invariably make a sorry mess of it. Another thing I've noticed: If a man has a speech prepared for a banquet, presentation or any occasion of that character, he had better give the reporter the manuscript and go it blind than trust himself to stick to his prepared speech, for, nine times in ten, he'll get away from his paper before he is half through, in which case he'll thank his stars forever that the reporter has a grammatical and reasonably coherent composition to print instead of his disjointed "impromptu" speech.—Dan Linahan in Globe-Democrat.

Growing Old Gracefully.

If now and then you will go to your study, your bed-room, your private office, or even in the crowded thoroughfare alone, and settle back into absolute quiescence, let your mind stop, let your muscles relax, let your nerves have a rest, you will find relief. Unless you have tried it you have no idea of the beneficial effect certain to be produced. A good-natured man who loves to work, who can sleep well and who enjoys being by himself now and then, and understands how to utilize books, pictures, flowers, the open field, the amplitudinous heaven, with all its glittering disclosure, why shouldn't he grow old gracefully? Why shouldn't his last days be gracious? Why shouldn't that great divinity which shapes our course spread for him in the very presence of his enemy, death, a table, bounteous with all the lusciousness of enjoyable life, at which, with peace in his soul, an undimmed vision to every faculty, he could meet the inevitable with a smile.

Accounting For It.

"The Czar's stable costs $1,300,000 annually," remarked Snagge, looking up from the paper.

"He must buy early strawberries, then," replied Mrs Snagge.—Pittsburg Chronicle.

Commissioner Coombs, of the Salvation Army, arrived in Winnipeg from Toronto on Friday night to be present at the marriage of Captain Rowe, of Toronto, and Captain Ham nee Pawau.

Rev. R. Whiting, pastor of Queen Street Methodist Church, Kingston, on Friday celebrated the 50th anniversary of his ministerial work. Fifty years ago he preached his first sermon.

An Englishman has invented a machine by the use of which a servant can clean a window in safety. It is adapted to the outside of the ordinary sash window and worked from within by moving a piece of belting backward and forward. The machine consists of a horizontal piece, which rests on the sill, the sash being shut down upon it during use, and an upright on which the cleaner proper—an attachment of brush or rubber—is run up and down outside by the motion given inside and carried round the corner by the belting which is carried round rollers. A water spray is fixed on to the travelling cleaner so as to play on the glass just above it, when fed by a rubber pipe, which ends in a bucket within the room. The water is driven up at will by squeezing a ball, which may be done with one hand, while the other works the belting.

We Lean on one Another.

O come and listen while I sing
  A song of human nature!
For high, or low, we're all akin
  To every human creature,
We're all the children of the same,
  The great—the "mighty Mother,"
And from the cradle to the grave
  We lean on one another.

It matters little what we wear,
  How high, or low, our station;
We're all alike—the slaves of sin
  And sons of tribulation.
No matter what may be the coat
  With which our hearts we cover,
Our hearts within are of one stuff
  And linked to one another.

A fool's a fool, the world o'er,
  Whate'er may be his station;
A snob's a snob tho' he may hold
  The sceptre of the nation.
And wisdom was ordained to rule,
  Tho' knaves aside may shove her,
That all the human race might live
  In love with one another.

A king may need our sympathy,
  For all his great attendance;
For among men there's no such thing
  As perfect independence.
Tho' great is mighty England's heir
  Poor Paddy is his brother!
And from the cabin to the throne
  We lean on one another.

The earth beneath's our common home,
  The heavens bending o'er us;
And wheresoever we may turn
  Eternity's before us.
By pride and envy we have been
  But strangers to each other,
But nature meant that we should lean
  In love on one another.

With Adam from the bowers of bliss
  We all alike were driven;
And hing and cadger at the last
  Must square accounts with Heaven,
We're all in need of sympathy,
  Tho' pride the fact may smother;
And it's as little's we can do—
  To comfort one another.

LONDON'S SMOKE CLOUD.

Three Hundred Tons of Smoke Hanging Over the World's Capital.

The investigations of a society formed in London to abate the smoke nuisance afford a rather startling idea of the wonderful extravagance of the present system of combustion. Here is a summary of a late report of the Smoke Abatement Institute: "The weight of the smoke cloud over the city is estimated at about 50 tons of solid carbon and 250 tons of hydro-carbon and carbonic oxide gases. From actual tests the value of coal actually wasted through the obstinacy of the Cockneys is £2,257,500, or 42 per cent. of the amount expended for coal in London, that being the percentage of heat that escapes up chimney without warming anybody. This waste also causes a useless expenditure of £268,750 for carting coal, to say nothing of the wear and tear of streets and of £43,000 more for carting away ashes. Altogether about £2,500,000 is yearly thrown away in London. Add to this £2,000,000 for injury to property from the smoke-laden atmosphere, and there is shown a total of £4,500,000 which London annually loses because of the failure to burn coal under proper conditions." Nearly all this waste and smoke could be prevented by a general adoption of improved methods of constructing chimneys, fire-places, furnaces and heaters.

Triumph of Grit.

We heard a rather illustrative story lately from one of our neighboring factory towns. An old-fashioned Yankee of Quaker stock, who ran a small shoe factory, indulged in a theory that nothing could pay out of his mind that a moral wrong was somehow perpetrated upon the community at large if a woman were allowed to earn above a stipulated sum each week. As his help was paid by the piece, and he had to keep tally in the main with current prices, he found this rather hard to manage at times. The swiftness of one young woman especially troubled him greatly. She would persist in running financially ahead of others. At last he made a special cut down in her prices, and told her why he did it. She gave him a baleful glance, tightened her lips, and went on working. By Saturday night next, despite the cut down, she made ten cents above the week before. Another week went by, when he cut her down still more. The damsel still proved game and rose to the occasion. After a week or more the Quaker conscience grew "scared" and asked her what she meant. "It means," said the girl, "that you may keep on and I'll keep on till you have a corpse on your hands in this workroom, for I'm grit and you can't conquer me!" The race ended there, and the girl was allowed normal pay.—Boston Advertiser.

When to Keep the Eyes Shut.

We are told to keep our eyes ever open, but it is often well to keep them shut. One of the chief causes of nervous disease is the straining of the eyes and the constant tension of the mind. When stretched out in the barber's chair do not try to read a newspaper, but close your eyelids under the soothing undulations of the lather brush, or the dreamy sensation of the shampoo, with the darkey's big hands gliding over your pate. In a railway carriage, instead of staring out your sockets at the landscape that is being torn into shreds before you, fold your arms, bow your head and listen to the whir of the wheels that make an accompaniment to the wordless song crooning in your heart. Again, in the concert-room, in place of surveying the audience critically, or watching the beauty of the singer behind the footlights, shut your eyes once more and let the music sink into your soul, rocking it on waves of emotion and wafting it insensibly into the ideal world.

The Wonderful Human Eye.

"The power of the human eye is simply remarkable. Why, lion-tamers can control the fiercest beasts by simply looking at them."

"That's all rot."

"Did you ever try it?"

"Yes. I was attacked by a Grigsby bulldog the other day and looked it steadily in the eye, resolved to control it, but the scheme wouldn't work."

"Why not?"

"I neglected to climb a tree before commencing to stare at the beast."

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Duke of Sparta, who is to marry the second and favorite daughter of the Prince of Wales, the Princess Victoria, is said to be a tall, fresh-complexioned young man with pleasing manners and "an innocent expression." The Princess Victoria, who will be 20 years old next July, was in her childhood remarkably plain, but now gives promise of developing into as handsome a woman as her mother.

THE new Maxim gun, rest and all, weighs fifty pounds and is fired from the shoulder By it an expert can fire three thousand rifle balls in eight minutes. The officer who did the firing at the first test a few days ago had never tried it before, yet he discharged three thousand shots in twelve minutes the first time. A thin line of men armed with this terrible weapon would be almost impregnable to an advancing army

THE New York Sun thus recounts the matrimonial experiences of the daughter of a Parisian wine dealer: 1. Marrried a singer. 2. He ran off with an actress. 3. Divorced. 4. Married an ex-priest. 5. She eloped. 6. Divorced. 7. Married a mayor's son, the officiating magistrate being her second husband, who showed no ill feeling and joined in the subsequent festivities, after delivering a touching exhortation to the happy couple.

FRANCES E. N. HARPER has been telling the intellectual women gathered at Washington that in her opinion "the neglected rich" should receive more attention from philanthropists. She thinks that many people of wealth are fast going to perdition, with no one to arrest their descent and give them a helping hand. How would it do to form an Association for the Moral Guidance of Those Whose Incomes are More than $20,000 a Year Apiece?

THE case of the steamship Great Eastern presents a good specimen of bad luck. Men were killed at her launch and she made her builder bankrupt; she had an explosion on her first trip from London, on the south coast, by which men were killed. Then her captain was drowned before she went a regular voyage. She then was nearly wrecked off the Irish coast, got aground in America and tore a great aperture in her hull, and now she is to be broken up as a useless craft.

DR. GATLING has made important improvements in his machine gun within the past two years. It is now a terrible arm. It can be pointed down upon a torpedo boat from a ship's deck, or upon a launch, when it is very near to the vessel. The English naval officers are loud in the praises of his gun. It throws a shower of balls with a terrible force, as thick as hail stones in a hail storm. A vessel's deck is swept by this great force, and assaults upon harbor defences, by scaling parties, can be overcome at once by a few of these guns properly placed in the fort. It is not a cannon, but a gun throwing ounce bullets in showers. Its force is fatal for a mile, and for this class of projectiles it is the most formidable arm ever invented. It is reported that an English syndicate desires to purchase Dr. Gatling's patents and plant.

RAILROADING in Montana in the winter time seems to be carried on under difficulties. Not long ago the story was told of water freezing in the boiler of an engine while the fireman was steadily shovelling coal into the firebox, and now another paper reports a still more surprising occurrence. It says in substance that the driving-wheels of a locomotive, after standing for some time, were found to have become so solidly frozen to the rails that the engine could not at first be started. When finally it commenced to move "a heavy humping sound on the roof of the car led the engineer to suspect that something was wrong, and he found to his horror that he was tearing up the track as he went. The rails were so tightly frozen to the drive-wheels that when the engine started the spikes were drawn and the rails wound up on the wheels." It is a relief to be informed that only a few hundred feet of the track were thus destroyed before the difficulty was discovered and remedied.

IT is quite the fashion on the other side of the ocean to send gifts of rare flowers no longer in boxes or baskets, as has been the custom, but arranged in some rare specimen vase, ceramic or silver, as the occasion warrants. Not only are the floral offerings treated to this valuable conveyance, but the receptacle is also adorned with wide ribbons, jauntily tied. One of the gifts sent to the Prince and Princess of Wales on their silver wedding was a lovely vase of pure white orchids, surmounted by an arch from which was suspended a cluster of the largest and most perfect black grapes, tied with silver cord, with some orange blossoms introduced. The contrast of the dark grapes, with their lovely bloom, against the mass of white orchids, must have been ravishing. However, as few pocketbooks can stand this sort of thing, perhaps for a steady pull the pure and simple bunch of flowers wrapped in white paper will do. Young men may continue to buy three Catharine Mermets or a cluster of lilies of the valley for their best and second best girls, and, unless the dear creatures hear of this London wrinkle, they will be just as well contented as if they had a few yards of sash ribbon and a $10 vase thrown in.

Anything to Bring Him.

"Well, how is this, my dear sir?" inquired the local practitioner, "you send me a letter stating that you had been attacked by smallpox and I find you suffering from rheumatism." "Well, you see, doctor, it's like this," said the patient, "there wasn't a soul in the house who could spell rheumatism."

How to Get Into a Mess and How to Get Out of It.

At an art exhibition: "That picture of X's is a fearful daub, don't you think?" The gentleman addressed—"I beg your pardon, but I'm the artist." "Oh, I beg ten thousand pardons! The fact is, I don't know anything about art—I just repeat what I hear every one saying!"

A Compliment.

Miss Giddy (at a progressive euchre party)—Just look at me, Mr. Lavisher, with a horrid fool's cap for a bobby prize. I know I look like a fright.

Mr. Lavisher (never lost for a compliment)—Oh, not at all. It's very becoming. Just suits your style of beauty.

THE PANTRY GHOST.

And What a Godsend He Proved to a Country Family.

(Mrs. M. L. Rayne in the Detroit Free Press.)

It not only "took the cake," but everything else it could lay its hands on, in the way of cooked dainties. Occasionally pork and cabbage went, but pies disappeared with fatal regularity. Doughnuts melted away like an untimely feast. The ghost not only ate the food, but was very particular to wash the dishes, which were found as clean as when new.

We barred the windows and locked the doors, but his ghostship disdained any of those mere mortal methods of entering, and came with persistent regularity.

It was a mystery that none of the household could fathom.

We were a family of adults of the staid, respectable sort, with (as we supposed) no skeleton in the closet. Our hired girl had been with us for years and had no family to support and no followers to feed. It was not the dog, for we had none; nor the cat, for she had her own private dishes set for her every day. Who, then, was the ghost with the abnormal appetite?

Hannah declared she heard chains clanking in the pantry, and we instituted a night watch, but without avail. Sometimes, indeed, toothsome dainties were eaten in the daytime, when for a moment Hannah was absent or engaged elsewhere.

"Set a trap for him," suggested mother.

"Try Paris green," said father. "I cannot shoot him on sight, as he is not to be seen, but we might make his food disagree with him."

"There's no trap as would hold a ghost sure," commented Hannah.

"Did you ever hear of a ghost with such an awpetite?"

The next day an almond cake was swept away, and not a vestige left.

"I think I'll call in the police," said my father angrily. "It's something human, and we are bound to find it."

The next morning we heard a shout of triumph from Hannah.

"The ghost! The ghost! I've got him Come quick, if ye plaze, or he'll be gettin off!"

We all rushed in haste to the scene of action. Sure enough, Hannah was holding him in a grasp of iron.

"A boy!" we shouted in chorus.

"Where did you find him?" asked father as he relieved Hannah.

"In the cellar, sure, where he's been hidin' an' livin' on the fat of the land these two weeks," said Hannah.

"How did you come here?" asked father in his judicial voice.

"C-a-r-s," mumbled the boy.

"Whom do you belong to?

"N'body."

"Where did you come from?

"N' York."

"But how did you get into the pantry?"

"Trap door."

Sure enough! There was a disused trap door which led to the cellar. We could all see now how easy it was, after once being secreted in the cellar, to use that.

Well, the ghost was laid, but here was this dreadful boy on our hands.

We went into council and decided as a whole that a boy so ready and willing to help himself might be made useful to others, and concluded to give him a chance.

It was the best investment we ever made. As farm-boy, house-boy and general factotum "the ghost" is invaluable. He still possesses the abnormal apetite, but regular meals, with much "pcing" between, have saved the pantry from any further depredations.

Once mother referred to his past. She asked him how he managed to leave the dishes so clean after his ghostly visits.

And he answered, with a smack: "Licked 'em."

He Didn't Sleep Much.

He was rather given to late hours, and his wife remonstrated with him, so he promised her faithfully that he would reform. It would have been all right if his friends had not heard of it.

"So John H. has reformed, has he? Humph, we'll see." The "saw" him in procession. First he met one old chum, then another, and it never dawned upon him that it was a conspiracy.

The first night that John H. reached home after he had made that promise to his wife, it was very late or rather it was very early. In fact it was early morning. He took off his boots, managed to hang his hat up, and walked softly into the room where his wife slumbered. So far all was good. He divested himself of his coat, and just as he was hanging it on the gas bracket his wife woke up.

"Why, John," she claimed; "what on earth are you getting up so early for?"

This was a poser, but John was equal to the occasion.

"That's all right," he said; "you know I've reformed, Mv. an' there's lots of people I've got to see early in the mornin'."

And he deliberately put on his coat and boots, found his hat and went out again, while Mrs. H. turned over with a fiendish chuckle and went to sleep.

Ladies' Head Gear Seen on the Streets Yesterday.

A green bronze straw bonnet had little clusters of shades of blue pink, brown and cream bows.

A gold-colored straw is trimmed with shades of copper ribbon.

Dark brown hats are trimmed with pink and green.

Dark blue straws and trimmings of shaded blues, yellow and silver.

A light brown or ecrurban had a twist of darker velvet and big bow in front with a not of violets and leaves.

A black turban had low jonquils.

A pretty black lace net was trimmed all around the face with dangling gold sequins.

Children's hats have wide brims and moderately high crown.

Many hats have ribbon streamers behind.

A pretty, small horn bonnet was decorated with blackberry-edged velvet ribbon, scarlet poppies and two dark green quills.

Violets trim many hats and bonnets.

Very small crushroses are in great favor.

Mr. Thomas Seldon was elected Mayor of Ingersoll yesterday to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mayor Buchanan.

ABUNDANCE FOR THE HEIRS.

The Romance of an English Officer and a Pretty Irish Girl.

In the townships of Kinointon and Ballou, county Longford, Ireland, lived two brothers named Sheridan. They were poor farmers and respected by their neighbors. Each had several daughters who were noted for their beauty, but the Sheridans, of Ballou, were conceded on all sides to be the handsomest women in the county. Nellie, the eldest daughter, was the typical rosy-cheeked Irish lass, and through her goodness and beauty won the heart of Robert Dudley Blake, an officer in the English army and a member of a rich and prominent family. He resigned from the army and taking Nellie with him to Scotland, married her in spite of the remonstrances of his family, who disowned him for the act.

Being wealthy in his own right Robert came to America with his young wife and established a millinery house at Mansfield, O. He was successful in his ventures, and after some years retired from active business life. About thirteen years ago the husband died and three years later the widow followed him, leaving a large estate to be divided among her relatives. The estate is said to be valued at $7,500,000, and the heirs mentioned in the will are Mary and Bridget Feeney, twin sisters, Margaret Feeney, Nora Feeney, their heirs or assigns, originally of Adgerton, county Longford, Ireland. Margaret Feeney is the widow of James Fitzsimmons, of Adgerton, and a Mrs. Reilly, of Matawan, N.J., is the Nora Feeney mentioned. Mrs. Fitzsimmons has a son on the police force of this city. Bridget Feeney is Mrs. Lawrence Corcoran, of South Orange, N.J.

The other heirs are Mrs. Ellen Silar, of Trenton, N. J., and Mrs. James Nally, of Millham, a suburb of Trenton. At the time of the death of the testatrix the estate was valued at £148,000, and it is said that by interest accumulated and judicious investments it has increased in value nearly fourfold. The Ohio portion of the estate has been similarly developed, it is said. All of the heirs are poor but worthy people. Mrs. Corcoran is the wife of a day laborer and goes out to work every day herself. Mrs. Silar is the wife of a flagman on the Pennsylvania Railroad. As soon as the relationships are established the estate will be divided.—New York Herald.

Strictly True

In every respect and attested by the testimony of thousands that Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor is a sure and painless cure for corns. The claim that it is just as good made by those endeavoring to palm off imitations for the genuine only proves the superiority of "Putnam's." Use only Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor. Sure, safe, painless.

Shocking Accident.

So read the headlines of many a newspaper column, and we peruse with palpitating interest the details of the catastrophe and are deeply impressed by the sacrifice of human lives involved. Yet thousands of men and women are falling victims every year to that terrible disease, consumption (scrofula of the lungs), and they and their friends are satisfied to believe the malady incurable. Now, there could be no greater mistake. No earthly power, of course, can restore a lung that is entirely wasted, but Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will rapidly and surely arrest the ravages of consumption, if taken in time. Do not, therefore, despair, until you have tried this wonderful remedy.

One of the most unique firm names in New York is that of "Dolby & Nolan Sons."

Nelson's Daughter.

Just before Nelson died aboard the Victory, after making matchwood of the allied French and Spanish ships, he thought of his little daughter Horatia, and solemnly bequeathed her to the nation. The Rev. Horatio Nelson Ward, son of little Horatia, has just died, and his death has revived the controversy respecting Horatia's mother. It is now said, apparently upon authority, that Horatia was not the child of Lady Hamilton. Her mother, it is mysteriously added, was too great to be even mentioned. Nelson's descendants now living are confident they have royal blood in their veins, but of what nationality the family archives say nothing.

Tax on Canadian Currency.

Local financiers and brokers state that the decision among Buffalo bankers to put a charge of 2 per cent. on all deposits of Canadian bank notes presented at their respective institutions will have the effect of driving Canadian currency out of the United States and of forcing people to take the precaution of getting their money exchanged in Canada before leaving for the other side. To avoid the tax, therefore, merchants, while paying accounts in the United States, will do so entirely by New York drafts.

One of the treasures prized by Robert Louis Stevenson is an old cabinet carved with designs, singularly quaint and original, made by Deacon Brodie, from whose life were drawn the materials for the story and play of that title. The deacon was hanged at Edinburgh on January 1st, 1788.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT, stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

Pierce's Pleasant Purgative LITTLE LIVER Pellets PILLS. The Original

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS. ALWAYS ASK FOR DR. PIERCE'S PELLETS, OR LITTLE SUGAR-COATED PILLS.

Being entirely vegetable, they operate without disturbance to the system, diet, or occupation. Put up in glass vials, hermetically sealed. Always fresh and reliable. As a laxative, alterative, or purgative, these little Pellets give the most perfect satisfaction.

SICK HEADACHE,

Bilious Headache, Dizziness, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, and all derangements of the stomach and bowels, are promptly relieved and permanently cured by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. In explanation of the remedial power of these Pellets over so great a variety of diseases, it may truthfully be said that their action upon the system is universal, not a gland or tissue escaping their sanative influence. Sold by druggists, 25 cents a vial. Manufactured at the Chemical Laboratory of WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, Buffalo, N. Y.

$500 REWARD

is offered by the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for a case of Chronic Nasal Catarrh which they cannot cure.

SYMPTOMS OF CATARRH.—Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak, watery, and inflamed; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a nasal twang; the breath is offensive; smell and taste are impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, or less understood by physicians. By its mild, soothing, and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures the worst cases of Catarrh, "cold in the head," Coryza, and Catarrhal Headache. Sold by druggists everywhere; 50 cents.

"Untold Agony from Catarrh."

Prof. W. HAUSNER, the famous mesmerist, Lisbon, N. Y., writes: "Some ten years ago I suffered untold agony from chronic nasal catarrh. My family physician gave me up as incurable, and said I must die. My case was such a trial, that every day, towards sunset, my voice would become so hoarse I could barely speak above a whisper. In the morning my coughing and clearing of my throat would almost strangle me. By the use of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, in three months, I was a well man, and the cure has been permanent.

"Constantly Hawking and Spitting."

THOMAS J. RUSHING, Esq., 56 Pine Street, St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I was a great sufferer from catarrh for three years. At times I could hardly breathe, and was constantly hawking and spitting, and for the last eight months could not breathe through the nostrils. I thought nothing could be done for me. Luckily, I was advised to try Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, and I am now a well man. I believe it to be the only sure remedy for catarrh now manufactured, and one has only to give it a fair trial to experience astonishing results and a permanent cure.

Three Bottles Cure Catarrh.

ELI ROBBINS, Rowan P. O., Colbert Co., Pa., says: "My daughter had catarrh when she was five years old, very badly. I saw Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy advertised, and procured a bottle for her, and soon saw that it helped her; a third bottle effected a permanent cure. She is now eighteen years old and sound and hearty."

FLESHERTON:

THURSDAY, APR. 19, 1888.

COME, GENTLE SPRING!

Spring is at hand. The first crow has cawed his caw, the robin has chirruped his first welcome notes, and other Canadian song-birds are following in rapid succession. Even the stately and dignified bull-frog is beginning to tune up his hoarse whistle. The air is is full of sweet music and balmy breezes, while the rippling brooks laugh and smile at you as they rush onward. The sun once more bursts through cloudland and occasionally beams upon the landscape in cloudless majesty. The last traces of the Snow King's presence are rapidly dissolving under the benignant rays of old Sol. The merry jingle of the sleigh-bells are heard no more. The fleecy garment has been discarded and soon mother earth will throw over the dead remnants of the past her glorious spring and summer apparel. "How fading are the joys we dote upon!" But its foolish to anticipate; let us proceed.

Spring is at hand. And now the clatter of wheels is heard on our streets, and the festive tramp springeth suddenly upon us "like a thief in the night." The lightning rod man follows close upon the heels of the tramp, and the sprightly and energetic bull-dog makes a good third in the procession.

Spring is at hand. The sidewalks have emerged from winter quarters. They plaintively call for repairs and groan beneath the tread of many feet. The pathmaster carefully counts the shekels at his disposal and maps out a line of action, which will at least prove satisfactory to himself. He is prepared for abuse and he usually gets it! Whether true or false, people will say he has a little axe of his own to grind. They tell him he is a fool anyway and never did know enough to pound sand.' The pathmaster would be a fit subject for the asylum if he adopted one half the advice gratuitously tendered him about this time of the year.

Spring is at hand. Evidences are not wanting, even in your backyard, where the refuse accumulated during the old Frost King's regime become suddenly and painfully recognizable. You have oculular and nasular demonstrations of this fact, and if you follow the honest dictates of either, you will remove the garbage and burn or bury it. Don't hire some yahoo to carry it off who will be sure to dump it in front of your neighbor's door under his very nose perchance. He doesn't like the stuff any better than you do, and will probably tell you so in somewhat forcible language. Don't allow your wood to block up the streets. Streets are calculated for public traffic and not for wood yards. Whoever tells you different—well, he does so because his woodyard is practically in the same place as yours! Now, if the streets are intended for general use, it might naturally be inferred that the wood you have placed there is intended for a similar purpose!

Spring is at hand: but don't you come fooling around THE ADVANCE office if you are a poet. It wouldn't be pleasant. We have warm greetings for all our friends and are always glad to see them—so long as no mention is made of poetry, especially spring poetry! Forty thousand wild cats couldn't scare our Fighting Editor when our sanctum is invaded by the meek-eyed, long-haired, tallow-faced Spring Poet. He gets awfully mad then and invariably reaches for the annihilator, calls up the bull-dog—then look out for a new kind of blizzard! No use for us to interfere, so beware! Just let the "gentle zephyrs blow," the "kine low," "the storm roar," "the maiden snore," "the flowers bloom," "the base rival fume," and all the rest of it. Later on in the season—when our Fighting Editor has retired from active duty—you may ease your lacerated feelings by copying nice little pieces from hymn books and such like, and, after appending your name thereto as author, send them to religious and secular journals as purely original matter! It is easier than taxing your own brains for ideas, and then the poetry reads much smoother. Several thousands do it every year, why not you?

EDITORIAL NOTES.

We never saw an elephant attempt the, to it, impossible feat of turning a somersault; but we have in our mind's eye an almost equally graceful attempt at the somersault business by an esteemed brother editor, who does not live a hundred feet from the Markdale Standard office. Last week this editor wanted better post-office accommodation, and expressed it as his belief that that institution should be carried on separately from any other business in order to bring about such a desirable state of things. But, before he has got half way through the very sentence in which he thus expresses his feelings, he suddenly fetches himself up with a violent jerk and warbles forth in this fashion:—"Yet when we look into "the matter more closely we are rather "inclined to the conclusion that it is very "possible, if not quite probable, that the "accommodation would not be improved "under other circumstances or under "different management." Ahem! THE ADVANCE is of opinion, that that editor can't most generally almost altogether always tell what his views really are upon this subject of post-office accommodation.

The Markdale Standard says "you can kill a stream by damming it." The people up there are away ahead of Fleshertonians in the matter of profanity, for we have yet to hear of a solitary case in this locality, where a stream has been "killed" in the way indicated by our contemporary!

The Dundalk Herald discoursed ancient fads and faddists last week. We know now what to call the "penitentiary" down there without outraging the proprieties, viz., the "Dundalk Corporation Fad!"

The Novelist—A Novel Enterprise

Novel in name, form, purpose and method is THE NOVELIST, Alden's new weekly magazine of American fiction.

It undertakes to give the worthiest fiction that AMERICAN authors can be tempted to produce. Foreign authors not admitted. It is not sentimental talk about justice to American authors, but it is bold practical action.

It is certainly handy in form, beautiful in dress, excellent in all mechanical qualities, and low in price; well suited in all respects to meet the wants of the intelligent millions who are capable of appreciating "the best"—it will not stoop to compete with the "gutter fiction" of the sensational periodicals and libraries.

Terms, $1 00 a year, at which rate it will give over 2,500 pages, equal to from eight to twelve ordinary American dollar novels.

The stories will follow successively, one at a time, a novel of ordinary length thus being completed in from four to eight weeks. If one story does not please, you will not have long to wait for the next. For a ten cent subscription (if you don't wish to enter for all at $1 00), you will receive the first chapters of every story published during the year, which you can then order separately, if you wish. A specimen copy of THE NOVELIST will be sent free on request. Address, John B. Alden, Publisher, 393 Pearl Street, New York; P. O. Box 1227.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RESTORER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, malnutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene L. Hill, M. D., 281 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c., and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how does sell." Prepared by

Our School System.

To the Editor of The Advance.

As Canadians, we boast of our System, and so we may, for undoubtedly it is well planned and successfully carried out. But, like other institutions, centralization and a gradual withdrawal of popular control is taking place. Inch by inch the rights of the people are invaded, and sooner or later the people who pay the bill will have nothing to say. I am not inclined to discuss [illegible] however its enemies may assert it might seem, but am confining myself to a matter recently [illegible] notice.

The [illegible] recently before the County Council, was called for information [illegible] of High School entrance examinations—a provision which is highly appreciated and for providing which there-in, the Government has made provisions for payment thereof; the sum was to be one of two modes, viz., seventy-five cents per pupil passing such examination, or $4 per day. The County Council adopted the system of 75 cents per pupil. In a large County like this, it was found very disadvantageous to send every pupil to Owen Sound to be examined. The Council ordered, or let me say, requested to have local examinations, and they were granted—one at Durham, one to alternate with Markdale and Flesherton, and one to alternate, I think, with Meaford and Thornbury. But it was soon found that the Inspector made a plea that the pay was not sufficient, and, therefore, bills of $4 per day and travelling expenses, for presiding at those outposts came before the Council, exorbitant charges for caretaking of suitable houses and stationery, and the 75 cents per pupil were all absorbed in Owen Sound.

Any one may see, that it seemed to the Council as paying too much for the fiddle, and so they decided to abide by their enactment and in future pay nothing more than reasonable travelling expenses of persons sent to these outposts, additional.

If my memory serves me, something like 200 pupils were examined, yielding close upon $200. The minutes not having been received, I quote from memory. The question was raised as to whom was paid this large sum—no bill having been asked for or rendered to show it. The committee failed to see the justice of this extra charge for sending to those outposts. "If all students went to the Sound, a proportionate increase of presiding officers would be necessary, were at any rate and therefore if travelling expenses were paid, the sum provided 75 cents per pupil was ample."

It, I learn, this session is not to be allowed [illegible] Trustees of some of those outposts have been written to, to ascertain if their Board would pay what the Council resolutely refused to do, with the very mild intimation that minister Ross says the examinations need not be placed outside of Owen Sound. The injustice of such a proposition is preposterous on its face. Every rural section cannot furnish accommodation for such examinations, hence the larger buildings are sought, whilst the students may be from every section in the Townships, and not one from the place where it is held. Yet Flesherton or Markdale, as the case may be, is asked to pay the piper. The wily leader of this proposition is well known—a man who has succeeded admirably on times gone by in manipulating the Council. But if the temper of the present Council remains unchanged, they are going to have something to say in this question, feeling assured that Ross or any other person can see that these gentlemen have been unjustly treated. We pay ten dollars per school annually, with at least $1 travelling expenses for every school, besides $3 per day, whilst presiding at intermediate and Model School examinations. And yet the person alluded to says it doesn't pay. Why if those entrance examinations were given gratuitously, it would only beget a feeling on their part that the people were not financially pinched by every turn of the educational wheel. What is wanted is new blood men that can do a day's work in a day. Then, I am persuaded, the pay would be ample enough.

It is to be hoped the outpost School Boards will refuse such demands—if nothing more, it should be done because of the principle involved.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. From our own Correspondent.

Beautiful spring weather has come at last and preparations are made in every quarter for the rush of work now coming on. Camp fires are seen here and there where the sap boilers are busy making sugar, and a good season is reported.

Our old friend, Johnson Little, has, to better his fortunes, moved to Flesherton Station, where we wish him every success. The blacksmithing business here will be carried on by his brother, Charles Little, who no doubt will give every satisfaction.

Miss Blakely and Miss Lever, of Flesherton, are expected to do a millinery business here, and from reputation, they will no doubt be successful in their undertaking.

A considerable amount of sickness is reported in every direction.

Our Postmaster, W. Long, has been laid up a few days, and D. K. Preston, mail contractor, is also laid up with a severe cold.

Mr. James Brownridge has purchased what is known as the Harrison farm and will now be able to carry on farming more extensively.

Eugenia.

From our own Correspondent.

Following items were received too late for last week's paper.—ED.

We have one of the most careful mail carriers in the country—careful of himself! Last Friday was one of the pleasantest days of the season, still Curry failed to put in an appearance, consequently no mail either ways. I have not been able to ascertain the cause of his delinquency, but suppose he was away on another fox-hunting excursion!

There is some talk of organizing a Sons Temperance lodge here. This is a move in the right direction, as I think it would do a vast amount of good in Eugenia. Hurrah! boys and girls, and let us join the order and do what we can to defeat "Old King Alcohol."

It is sometimes said that "a word to the wise is sufficient." I had hoped that the warning I had given to these little boys of Eugenia, who call themselves men, would be sufficient also. But, alas for hopes! However, their names are well known, and if they persist in their rowdyism they will probably receive a little public notoriety.

Mr. J. Carson has just put in one of his famous chopping mills for Mr. Sloan. The mill gives entire satisfaction.—KATE.

Our exchanges have been blathering about Vanderbilt's French cook and his $10,000 salary, until we feel like rebelling against fate. But the fates are inscrutable, and some men are born handsome and some men are born French cooks. There is one thing about this matter that reconciles us to earth the right, and that is the reflection that Mr. Vanderbilt and his French cook have got to sit right down this spring like we ordinary mortals and take what's left of the new potatoes after the slimy, dirty little potato bugs have got in their work.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:

My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons, while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"Yes," Shirley admitted, turning her face again to the window, with her eyes upon the darkness.

Ruby sat down beside her in the firelight, still holding her hands in hers, and there was silence between them. Ruby's heart was beating fast with hope and expectation; but Shirley was calm with the calmness of despair—she hoped nothing, she feared all. Her only thought now was for Guy. A few tender lines from him had been given her just before he and Oswald started, bidding her take courage, for that his hope was strong; but she knew that, though it was strong, it was groundless. How could she help him to bear it?

"Ruby," said the sweet low voice, which had always a pathetic little intonation, but which now had such a despairing sadness in its music, "you have been crying, dear."

"Nonsense, Shirley! Crying? I don't know how."

"Ah, but there are tears on your face, and tears in your voice," Shirley said, gently. "You must not fret, Ruby, or you will make yourself ill; and then"—with a little break in the calm voice—"what would become of me?"

"You need not be afraid of that, Shirley. I am never ill."

"Was Alice very angry?" Shirley said softly, after a little pause. "Is she very bitter against me, Ruby?"

"Don't talk of her, Shirley; it exhausts the very small amount of patience I possess," answered Miss Capel pettishly.

"But, dear, think how much she must be suffering if, as I fear, she loved Sir Hugh," said Shirley, pitifully finding room in her aching heart for compassion for the girl who had none for her. "You, who have been so good to me, must feel for her also. Poor Alice!"

"Poor Alice!" echoed Ruby disdainfully. "She is greatly to be pitied indeed! She is as capable of feeling love for anyone but herself as that oak table is."

"Hush, dear!" Shirley said, gently. "It is very unlike you to be uncharitable. I have been thinking so much of Alice all night" she went on softly. "It was terrible to reflect that I had brought suffering to her also; and, when Delphine said she was ill, I wished so much to go to her and see if I could do something for her. It is almost the same trouble for her as for Guy, you know; but he, being a man, will feel it more."

"If it is any consolation to you, Shirley, to know that she is not either ill or unhappy, you may safely believe me when I say so," Ruby answered. "She is only spiteful and savage."

"Ruby dear!" said the sweet tones, in reproof; and impulsive Ruby put her lips to Shirley's cheek and gave a quick, loving kiss.

"You are an angel, Shirley," she said, warmly. "Tell me, dear," she added, gently, "do you feel hopeful?"

A long shudder passed through the girl's slender frame, and her eyes met her friend's glance with a pathetic misery in their depths.

"I have no hope, Ruby," she said. "I have had none from the first."

"But, Shirley——"

"There is no chance, Ruby. Nothing, I believe, could set me free," Shirley declared, in the same hopeless, despairing manner. "I think that, even if he wished, Sir Hugh could not undo the marriage he contrived so basely. But, oh, Ruby"—and here the frozen calm of her face broke up and the pale lips quivered—"think—all my life to come must be passed with that man whom I cannot help despising with my whole heart. And I am so young; and I am strong too, or such misery as I have borne since yesterday would have killed me."

Ruby crept closer to her in silence, the hot tears gathering thickly in her eyes at the awful despair in Shirley's voice and on her pale face.

"But even that I could bear," the girl went on in her husky broken voice, "if that were all; it is the thought of Guy's sorrow, however, that is breaking my heart. If I could bear that for him I should be happy; but——" She paused, half rose, wringing her hands despairingly, then sunk back upon her seat again, all her frame shaken in a convulsive agony of tearless sorrow. "But there is no hope, and he loves me so dearly. Oh, it is horrible, Ruby. Can Heaven be merciful and allow such misery as this?"

The cry was wrung from her like the wail of a broken heart. Ruby threw her arms around her, sobbing bitterly; and she felt how she trembled in every limb.

"Shirley, for Guy's sake compose yourself. See—they will soon be here now. He must not see you thus."

For Guy's sake! Even in such anguish as hers the words were powerful. She hid her face on Ruby's breast for a moment, and when she lifted it again it was pale and haggard, but calm.

"Yes," she said, faintly, "for Guy's sake!"

"My brave Shirley!" Ruby responded tenderly, and for fully half-an-hour the girls sat in the fire-lit hall, Ruby's eyes watching anxiously and sorrowfully the still face turned toward the window, with such terrible pallor and anguish upon it.

Presently a carriage dashed up to the door; but it was only Lady Fairholme and Lady Capel returning from a drive. As they entered the hall, stately in their velvet and furs, with a footman in attendance, Shirley and Ruby rose, and went a step or two forward. Lady Capel saw them, and took Shirley's hand and kissed her; but the words she would have spoken died away upon her lips, as she saw the alteration in the girl's face, and she went on with a mist in her kind eyes. Lady Fairholme had stood still and glanced at them; but she had passed on immediately, without a word or a second look at her husband's niece, and her voice was perfectly unmoved the next minute when she asked why the hall was not yet lighted.

Without a word, Shirley went back to the window; her misery was too great for her aunt's cruelty to touch her; but Ruby's face flushed angrily, and she bit her red lip to suppress the passionate words which in her indignation she was about to utter.

The hall was lighted now, the full glare of gas replacing the ruddy firelight; and the footman had replenished the fire, which blazed up cheerily. Presently Alice came out of the oak parlor and crossed the hall on her way upstairs, her soft pink cashmere draperies sweeping the polished floor as she went her way affectedly and languidly; and still Ruby and Shirley kept their vigil at the window watching for the dog-cart which was to bring Oswald and Guy from the station.

"Ruby, you will be cold; go to the fire, dear," Shirley said softly once: but Ruby did not move.

At last two bright lights came flashing into view in the darkness without, and the sound of rapidly approaching wheels grew clearer and clearer. Shirley rose then, still and calm; but Ruby was trembling so violently that she could hardly stand. Shirley put her arms around her.

"I am afraid all this is too much for you," she said tenderly. "Ruby, how shall I bear it if I have made you ill, too?"

"I am not ill—I am only nervous. Oh, Shirley!" she added, as the hall door was hastily opened from without, and Captain Fairholme, looking haggard and weary, entered, pausing for a moment and shading his eyes, as if the sudden transition from darkness to light dazzled him; then he shut the door behind him, and the girls heard the dog-cart being taken back to the stables.

"Oswald," Shirley said, as she went a few steps toward him, while Ruby, quite overcome by her agitation, sunk down upon the nearest chair and hid her face in her hands, "how cold and tired you look! Come and warm yourself and rest."

Oswald had started violently as her soft calm voice fell upon his ear; then he came to her side, with one swift glance at Ruby's drooping figure, and took both her little hands in his. Burning with fever as they had been a short time previously, they were icy cold now, so cold that the young man could not repress an exclamation

"How cold you are!" he ejaculated; and for a moment they stood looking at each other in silence, the young officer's eyes full of unspeakable pity and compassion, the girl's heavy with hopeless misery and woe.

"I have no good news for you, dear," he said slowly.

"I did not expect any, Oswald," was the answer, uttered so brokenly, so pitifully, so despairingly, that the tears rose in Captain Fairholme's eyes. "Thank you for all your goodness to—to us. Come and help me to console Ruby," she added.

Captain Fairholme went over to the fire, his eyes dim, and his lips quivering under his dark mustache. Shirley went to Ruby and raised her drooping form and rested the girl's head upon her breast.

"Ruby," she said softly, "try to be brave, dear. You will distress Oswald, and he is very weary."

She drew her gently over to the fire, and for a few minutes they stood there together, Ruby's head on Shirley's breast and her hand in Oswald's, who was hardly less moved. Shirley was the only one who retained any semblance of composure, but she was calm with the calm of despair.

"They give us no hope," Captain Fairholme said then, huskily. "They think that any court would ratify the marriage. Even if you could give a good reason for going to Dumfife with Sir Hugh, it would avail nothing."

"I knew it would be so," said Shirley wearily. "Hush, dear Ruby, don't sob so! And—and Guy—how does he bear it, Oswald?"

The frozen calm of her face was breaking now, and her breath came fast

"Badly, I fear," Oswald said sadly. "It is early days as yet, Shirley."

"Yes."

There was a pause.

"Where is he, Oswald?"

He left me at the cross-roads," Oswald replied. "He wanted a walk, he said. Why, Shirley—good Heaven, what is the matter? What are you going to do?"

For Shirley had rushed away down the hall, and was trying with her little hands, so frail and trembling, to unfasten the heavy bolts of the hall door.

"At the cross-roads!" she repeated, lifting her great restless eyes to her cousin's face, with a wild terror in their depths. "Don't you perceive where he was going? Oh, be quick—for pity's sake, be quick!"

"But, Shirley——"

"Oswald, don't you see?" she cried wildly. "At the cross-roads! He was going to Maxwell—and they must not—oh, Heaven, they must not meet now!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

Alone in the library of his splendid home, Sir Hugh Glynn was thinking of the evil deed he had wrought. He was lying back in a deep, luxurious arm-chair. His uncle, from whom he had inherited Maxwell, had been a bibliomaniac, and he had not spared his wealth, which had been great, to gratify his mania.

Many a volume which would have delighted a connoisseur, but which possessed little interest for the uninitiated, lined the shelves which surrounded the room on all sides, broken into on one by the carved doorway which faced the magnificent black marble mantel on the other. Even between the two great stained-glass windows, the volumes had taken refuge; there was not an available space anywhere which had not been utilized, and the room contained as magnificent a collection of books as any in the kingdom.

But the present owner of the collection cared but little for it at any time. Had he wanted money, it would not have cost him a pang to sacrifice the books over which his uncle had spent so much time and trouble and so much gold. But now he never gave them a thought. There was a heavy frown upon his brow, partly of displeasure and partly of pain; for his injured arm troubled him still, and the fever of his mind had not tended to lessen his bodily discomfort.

He was alone at Maxwell; but he had no present intention of remaining there. As soon as this troublesome business was settled, he would take his wife to the south of France to introduce her to his mother, and then they would travel for a time. He had no doubt as to the result of Major Stuart's application to the lawyers. Even if the matter were brought before the law-courts, the decision must have been in his favor. Shirley could not account for her visit to Dumfife with him; for, even if it would have saved her, she would not betray her brother's trust and ruin his reputation and his prospects. She was his wife, Sir Hugh knew, married to him by the abominable law in force in the country in which poor Shirley had passed three dreary years, which had culminated in this crowning misery—married to him by treachery and baseness and falsehood truly, but his nevertheless. Yet, even while Hugh Glynn's eyes brightened as he thought of her beauty and grace and sweetness, the frown on his white forehead deepened as he puffed slowly at his cigar and remembered the look of horror, of loathing, of contempt, which had been on his wife's face when he saw it last.

"If she had loved me only a little!" he said, half aloud, with a sudden yearning in the blue eyes which chased away all their sleepiness and their coldness. "If she had given me a little of the love she lavished upon him—hang him!" And the blue eyes darkened with savage jealousy and anger. How easily Guy had won that for which he would have given his life.

Why, even for the possession of her, to call her his own, to look upon her loveliness, and know that she was his wife, he had given his honor. What would he not have given to see her eyes rest upon him as they rested upon Guy, to have her lips meet his in requited love, to feel her hand steal into his and linger there? His wealth, his life! For he loved her.

He loved her. That was his one excuse for the treachery he had committed, and which, even in his own eyes, seemed hideously vile. He loved her madly, wildly, with all the passion of his nature; and instead of letting this love lift him to a higher life, he had yielded to the subtle temptation with which he had been tempted, and let it sink him to the level of a traitor.

She was Guy's betrothed, Guy's one ewe-lamb in all the world, for he had neither riches, nor title, nor position, nor beauty to win a woman's fancy and subdue her heart; and Guy was his friend, his tried and trusty friend, to whose courage he owed the life he enjoyed. His friend—and yet he had betrayed him! Guy had saved his life, and he had taken from him what was far dearer to him than life. When that fatal love that had entered both hearts at sight of Shirley Ross's fair face had come between them, all the old friendship and gratitude had died out of Hugh Glynn's heart, killed by his savage jealousy and passion. Many a time he had felt that he could have killed Guy Stuart when he had seen him with Shirley, and the very repression he had been forced to exercise had doubled his passionate resentment. And then Latreille had told him the story of poor Marian Ross's betrayal, which had suggested the idea of her daughter's; and temptation had come into his way through Guy's faith in him and Shirley's, and thus he had betrayed it, thus he had requited.

He rose from his seat and moved up and down the stately room restlessly. He almost wished that he had spared her; and yet to leave her to Guy—to let her be his wife—no, it was impossible! But that scornful face, that wailing, despairing cry which rung in his ears even now. Ah, how she loved Guy!

Amid all his jealousy and remorse and triumph, the bitterest thought in Sir Hugh Glynn's mind was that in his place Guy Stuart would have acted very differently. If Shirley had loved him—Hugh—Guy would never have lifted his finger, if by so doing he could have won her love; he would have buried it in his own heart and gone away without one word to trouble her peace or to pain the friend who had been more fortunate than he. Sir Hugh felt instinctively that that would have been Guy's course in his place, and the thought of that superiority in the man who had been his friend rankled cruelly.

Sir Hugh Glynn loved Shirley, but his love was selfish and unworthy; it was a mixture of passion and admiration for her beauty and pride piqued by her indifference. Guy's love—the man who hated him felt it keenly—Guys love was a nobler love than that.

As the thought crossed his mind, the room door opened quietly, and the man he had wronged entered and closed it after him without a word. Sir Hugh stopped his restless perambulations to and fro, and for fully a minute the two men faced each other in utter silence the—betrayed and the betrayer—the man so cruelly wronged and he who had so cruelly wronged him. In a breathless heavy silence, grim and menacing, they looked at each other, Sir Hugh so handsome and stately for all the suffering which his face showed signs of still, Guy pale, worn, haggard, with a terrible despair on his face—despair which had something reckless in its misery; then Sir Hugh threw back his head with a proud gesture of defiance and said calmly—

"This is an unexpected pleasure. After the courtesies we exchanged yesterday, I could hardly have foreseen this visit."

"Perhaps not"—Guy's voice, hoarse and changed and menacing, fell upon the stillness heavily and slowly—"nevertheless I am here, as you see."

"Charmed to have the honor." Sir Hugh said carelessly; and Guy's eyes lightened with a passionate gleam of fury.

"Take care!" he said between his set teeth. "I am in no mood for exchanging civilities; neither am I in a mood to bear your jeers."

"Then to what am I to attribute the honor you are paying me?" Sir Hugh asked calmly.

Traitor he was, but not a coward, although just now the sting of his conscience told him that he richly deserved the vengeance which looked out of the furious gray eyes, almost black in their concentrated anger and scorn.

"To what?" Guy repeated. "I will tell you. To my desire for vengeance."

"For vengeance! I do not understand you. Is it on me that you would wreak your anger for your fiancee's infidelity? Is——"

The words were careless, haughty, mocking in their intonation; but they died upon his lip as Guy rested his hand upon his shoulders, swaying him to and fro with a resistless power.

"Take care," he said, "or I will force the words back through your jibing lips with one blow of my hand!"

Low as the words were spoken, there was a fierce, suppressed passion in their low-breathed utterance which made Sir Hugh Glynn quail for a moment; but his blue eyes, flashing with a steel-like glitter, met Guy's unflinchingly.

"It is not vengeance, but justice," Major Stuart said, in the same low tones—"justice only. Would any vengeance be as great as my wrongs?"

"Ah! You have been to Edinburgh?"

"Yes."

"And you have seen the lawyers you wished to consult?"

"Yes."

"And their opinion is?" Sir Hugh interrogated calmly, although the pitiless hand still kept its iron grip of his shoulder.

"You know it well," Guy said, with a sudden, irrepressible burst of pain. "I need not repeat it."

There was a moment's silence. They were standing on the rug now, and the red flames of the great log-fire, as it roared up the wide chimney, fell upon either face.

"There was no need to go," Major Stuart said hoarsely. "You took your measures well. She is your wife, poor unhappy girl; but for your treachery to me, your friend, your baseness to her, a poor child who trusted you, you shall answer to the uttermost, so help me Heaven.

"That I am in your power I know," Sir Hugh answered calmly. "A one armed man will be powerless indeed against such strength as yours. I have wronged you, you say; then take your revenge."

"Only a traitor would shelter himself behind his injuries," said Major Stuart, removing his hand nevertheless. "Can you deny the wrong? I trusted you and you betrayed me."

No reproach could have been more bitter, simple as the words were. Sir Hugh's eyes fell under the others glance, and he half turned away; then, conquering his momentary remorse, he resumed his old haughtiness.

"That the wrong is irreparable I know," Guy went on. "And yet, if you were generous— Such a marriage cannot be binding! It is not binding in the sight of Heaven! Glynn, think how I must suffer, not for myself, but for her, when I stoop to entreat you to set her free. Give her back to me. She does not love you," Major Stuart continued, hoarsely and brokenly. "And she was all I had. Hugh, for the sake of our old friendship, for the sake—yes, I will stoop to plead it—of the service I rendered you once long ago, renounce your claim upon her! Give Shirley her freedom!"

"It is impossible. She is my wife," said Sir Hugh, briefly. "Besides, she herself was willing. She knew her mother's story; she knew the Scottish marriage laws; and, my dear fellow, what you ask is simply an impossibility. Even were it not so, Shirley would never consent."

"How can you persist in that lie?" Major Stuart said, with bitter contempt. "The child's own word would not make me believe her false. Do you think the anguish of yesterday does not contradict your words? Each one of them is false as falsehood itself. You are a villain and a liar and a traitor!"

"By heaven, this is unbearable!" cried Sir Hugh, furiously, as he sprung forward.

Guy met him with equal fury. One moment more and they would have been at each other's throat or struggling in the terrible embrace of two men goaded to desperation, who seek vengeance at any cost—one moment more, and the stain of blood-guiltiness might have been on the soul of either; but in that moment the door was burst open and Shirley threw herself between them, pale, breathless, panting, her head uncovered, as she had come from Fairholme Court, her hair disheveled by her headlong flight through the cold night-wind, falling around her, her eyes wild and dilated with the horror and terror which had seized her.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The two men fell apart at the first touch of the little trembling hands, and the eyes of both turned upon the girl, who stood, panting and breathless, both hands pressed against her heart, as if to stop the throbbings which seemed as if they must rend it in twain, her face wild and haggard, shaded by her loosened hair, and faint little inarticulate cries of terror escaping from the pale, parted lips. Captain Fairholme, who had paused at the door, went forward quietly and put Shirley gently into a chair, and her head fell back against it in utter exhaustion.

"Has she not suffered enough yet?" said Oswald gravely. "Could you not have spared her this?"

He had turned to Guy, who stood breathing heavily from the restraint he had been forced to place upon himself; but, before he could answer, Shirley looked up quickly and put out one little hand with deprecating gesture of entreaty, which made Sir Hugh's eyes flash. Even now she was pitiful over her lover, he thought bitterly.

"No; do not," she said faintly—"do not blame him, Oswald. He has borne so much, and he has so much to bear. Guy"—she rose feebly and put her hand upon his arm—"try to forgive me, dear, and go home with Oswald."

"Forgive you, darling?" he questioned mournfully, looking down at the pale uplifted face. "I have never blamed you not for a moment; but, when I look at you, my poor pet, how can I forgive him?"

"Pardon me," Sir Hugh interposed haughtily, "you are speaking to my wife."

Guy's eyes flashed.

"I cannot look at her and forget it," he said bitterly. "Look! Are you not proud of your work?"

Almost involuntarily Sir Hugh turned his eyes upon her, as she stood half supported by her cousin, and his thoughts went back to the night of the ball at Fairholme Court six weeks before. He remembered Shirley then, bright, radiant, beautiful in her sweeping silken robes; he saw her now pale, haggard, lovely still, with that inalienable beauty of form which must always be hers, but with all her brightness faded forever. The contrast smote him with a keen pang of remorse as his eyes rested upon her.

"Guy," the sweet broken-hearted voice continued, "I want you to go away, dear, and not to come back again. It will be best. By and bye—not at first, I know—but after a time, perhaps—I think, I hope, I pray that you may forget me and be very happy. But first will you—can you forgive me?"

"How can you speak of forgiveness between you and me, Shirley?" he asked unsteadily. "There can be none ever needed, my poor child!"

"I did not think you would be angry with me," she said, with a touching child-like confidence in her voice. "But, Guy, if you wish it, I will tell you why I went."

"There is no need, my dearest," he answered gently, taking both her little hands in his; while Sir Hugh looked on, angry and jealous and furious, yet powerless to interfere. "I trust you."

"Thank you, Guy. And—and—you will try to forget?"

"To forget! Ah, Shirley, is that possible? While I have life, I must remember, my child!"

"We were very happy," she whispered brokenly, a smile pitiful to see curving the stiff livid lips. "It is something to have been happy together—even for a few hours, Guy."

"We were very happy, Shirley," he answered hoarsely, looking down with dim eyes at the ghastly face and the great hazel eyes glittering with a bright feverish lustre—"very happy, my poor, darling."

"And last night I was thinking," she went on in the same pitiful trusting manner, "that you might by-and-by have tired of such a foolish girl, and that it was better— I could not think very clearly, Guy," she added, resting her head against his arm, with a little gesture of weariness which was unutterably pathetic, "my head ached so—it aches so now."

Sir Hugh made a quick movement toward her, but Oswald Fairholme put his hand upon his arm.

"Have some pity," he said huskily; and Sir Hugh, involuntarily obeying the movement, drew back and turned away.

Oswald put his hand through his arm and gently forced him to the window, where he threw himself moodily into a chair, his eyes fixed on the group by the fire, while Oswald hid his face with his hand to shut out the despairing faces which haunted him. Shirley had rested her head against Guy's shoulder, and was looking up into his face with restless shining eyes, while her fingers, with a strange uncertain movement, strayed over his rough ulster. Major Stuart had put his arm round her, but he could not trust himself to look upon her face, and he had turned away his head, while under his heavy moustache his lips were set sternly and tightly, and in his brain the question repeated itself—Could any vengeance be too great for such wrongs as his and hers?

"Guy," the sweet low voice went on, while the restless eyes wandered from his face round the room and came back again to their first resting place, "won't you speak to me, dear? I thought all day that when you came back you would look as you look now. I saw your face all night—all night. Did you sleep, Guy? It seems to me as if I never should sleep again—my head turns so, and my eyes will not close. They told you, did they not, that I was his wife? I knew they would say so. His wife—oh, great Heaven!"

Hot Water for Plants.

It is a fortunate circumstance that a plant will endure a scalding heat that is fatal to most of its minute enemies. Water heated to the boiling point poured copiously over the stem of an enfeebled peach tree, and allowed to stand about its collar, will often have the happiest restorative effects. Trees showing every symptom of the yellows have often been rendered luxuriantly green and thrifty again by this simple means. The heat is presumably too much for the fungus which had infested the vital layers of the tree, immediately under the outer bark. The London florists recommend hot water, up to 145° F., as a remedy when plants are sickly owing to the soil souring—the acid, absorbed by the roots, acting as a poison. The usual resort is to the troublesome job of repotting. When this is not necessary for any other reason it is much simpler to pour hot water freely through the stirred soil; it will presently come through tinged with brown. After this thorough washing, if the plants are kept warm, new root points and new growth will soon follow. A lady friend had a fine calla in a three-gallon pot which showed signs of ill-health. On examination the outer portion of the filling was found mouldy, it being in large part fresh horse manure. As repotting was inconvenient, the plant being in flower, hot water was freely used; it killed the mould, and the plant began to revive and was soon all right.

St. Clair Tunnel Works.

The St. Clair Tunnel Co. are now actively engaged in the construction of the tunnel between Sarnia and Port Huron, Mich. A certain portion of the machinery and material used in the construction of the work will be obtained in the States, consisting principally of pumping machinery, paper tanks, and the shield used in carrying on the work of excavating. The expensive part of the material, consisting chiefly of cast iron plates for lining the tunnel, will be made in this city, and it is estimated that ten thousand pounds of this article will be required before the work is concluded. The Treasury Department of the United States has decided that on material manufactured in Canada no duty will be charged. The Canadian Customs authorities have made the same concessions regarding bridge material coming from the States and will not levy the duties upon such articles as they did when the International Bridge at Niagara and the Sault Ste. Marie bridge were in course of construction. It is estimated that the work on the St. Clair tunnel will involve an expenditure of a quarter of a million of dollars.

In a London Square.

'Mid the ceaseless throng, as it surged along,
In an angle of the street,
They stood and proffered their woodland flowers,
Sweet violets—not so sweet,
And lilies not so fair and pale
As the maiden's foam-white face,
With its fine, clear-carved Madonna brows,
And its subtle southern grace.

And the boy's dark eyes, with their grave surprise,
Had the twilight glow that shines
In southern lands where the sunshine falls
Through the dusk of purpling vines.
What bitter turn of fortune's wheel
Had sent the wanderers here,
From the shores where roses and lilies blow
All through the golden year?

And here and there a kindly heart
Would pause a moment's space,
Touched by the sister's pleading glance
And the wonderful Raffaelle face,
And purchase a dewy primrose knot—
A penn'orth of fairy gold—
By the silent lips and the speaking eyes
Repaid a hundredfold.

And, lingering there in the crowded square
I thought, Is this but one
Of the thousand sordid secrets hid
In our sorrowful Babylon?
Or is the silent woe that looks
From the maiden's great sad eyes
The shadow pale of some tragic tale
Of sleepless memories?

A German Co-operative Community.

The Amana community in Iowa, including a population of about 2,000, is an interesting illustration of the success of co-operative effort among thrifty Germans. The settlement was begun in 1855 and the colony now owns 26,000 acres of land. The land forms a single township and the people are grouped in seven villages. Each village is a social and industrial unit, and has a definite area assigned to it for cultivation and pasturage. The government of the colony affairs, as a whole, is invested in a Board of thirteen trustees, while each village has its Board of Elders, varying in number from seven in the smallest to eighteen in the largest. The central institution in each village is the "store," which is a large general retail establishment carrying groceries, drugs, dry goods, clothing, hats and caps, hardware, etc. Its bookkeeping is very elaborate, for, except in dealings with outsiders, the colonists do not ordinarily use money. Everything is done by a system of accounts which are kept at the "store." The blacksmith shop and the carpenter shop have accounts against the farm department which are duly recorded on the village books. Every family or adult has an account at the "store," certain credits being apportioned to all members by the elders at the commencement of each year, which are drawn against by purchasers. Boarding houses furnish meals to members in each village in groups of from forty to fifty each. Houses are assigned to families by the elders, who provide shelter for all. The community conducts a number of mills and manufacturing enterprises.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

ANTIQUITY OF THE TELEPHONE.

The Priests of India Have Used That Instrument for 2,000 Years.

"The principle of the telephone has been known for 2,000 years in India," was the rather incredible story made last night by Fred Amesbury, who has just returned to New York after a two years' sojourn in the land of striped tigers and wonderful fakirs. "I do not assert, mark you," continued Mr. Amesbury, "that they use the telephone as we use it, or that they have any system of general communication. What I do say is that the high-caste people have a method of communicating with each other by arbitrary action on a diaphragm, just as we do, but it is confined entirely to their temples, and its existence has remained a secret until within a very few years.

"I was in a town called Panj, about 200 miles from Madras, and while there became acquainted with an English officer named Harrington, who was a prime favorite with the natives because on one occasion he had saved a priest from drowning. He was a very genial, pleasant fellow, and had that peculiar magnetism about him that made and kept friends everywhere.

"It was through Harrington that I was enabled to learn the existence of telephonic communication and to satisfy myself of its antiquity.

"There are two temples in the village about a mile apart. In the interior and on the ground floor of each is a small circular structure which is guarded day and night from the natives, as well as from strangers, and is supposed to be the abiding place of the 'governing spirit,' but in reality is the terminus of the telephonic line, which is laid underground from one building to the other.

"The superstitious natives regarded this little structure with the greatest awe and reverence, because they had seen demonstrated before their eyes—or rather ears—the power of this spirit to communicate with the other temple. They were required to make their offering in one building, and make known their wishes and desires. Then immediately repairing to the second temple they would be informed of all they had said and done, although neither priest had left his post. This was regarded as a demonstration of the power of the spirit.

"We were unable to determine the composition of the wire that connected the two buildings. It was some kind of metal, but neither steel, copper, nor brass, although it closely resembled the latter. The transmitter was of wood and about the size of the head of a flour barrel, and to establish connection, instead of ringing a bell, the person wishing to attract attention at the other end stood close to the curious thing and shouted, "Ooey! ooey! ooey!"

"This was answered by a similar shout, which, though faint, was distinct, and could be heard two feet away.

"After Harrington and I had gained the confidence of the priests, or, rather, after he had, we were given a carte blanche to do as we pleased, and we talked to each other from one temple to the other for more than an hour, and were enabled to make an incomplete investigation.

"We learned that the telephone that we saw had been in use for thirty years. The priests were very old men, and they remembered that the line of communication had been renewed only once during their incumbency.

"They showed us the remains of worm-eaten transmitters and wooden conduits. They claimed that the system had been in existence since the creation, and laughed at us when we told them that the same principles has only been applied in England and America within the last dozen years. In every part of India and Burmah this system of secret communication exists, although hundreds of travellers have never suspected it. I believe that it dates back fully two thousand years."—New York Sun.

THE ORCHID CRAZE.

A Widespread Mania that Almost Equals the Celebrated Tulip Madness.

It is a genuine mania. There were a few cases of it before, but the malady never became alarming till about six years ago, when it began to attract public attention in England. Like gout and hay fever, it is most likely to attack persons of large means, high social position and blue blood. Poor people are never victims of it. A singular peculiarity about it is that it is much more likely to attack men than women. Like hydrophobia, leprosy and consumption, it is pronounced incurable. That it is contagious is admitted by all who have given attention to the matter. Some wealthy Americans who were in London four or five years ago contracted the disease and brought it to this country. It is now quite prevalent in New York, and there are a few cases in Boston and a smaller number in Chicago, St. Louis and other Western cities. It has for several years been the custom of hay fever sufferers to hold an annual reunion. The victims of the orchid mania are following their example. About fifty of them met in New York not long since and had a very enjoyable time. They brought with them about eight hundred varieties of the plant over which they have gone daft. A large proportion of the nobility and gentry of England are victims of the orchid craze. All the members of the Rothschild family, whether living on the Continent or in Great Britain, are orchid fanciers. Baron Schroder, Mr. Chamberlain and Sir John Lubbock have very large collections. Mr. Sanders, of St. Albans, has four acres covered with glass that are entirely devoted to producing orchids. Mr. Chamberlain's collection cost him $40,000, but is valued at more than twice that sum. He has nine glass houses full of orchids, many of which are exceedingly rare. They are all joined together and are connected with conservatories and hot houses in which other flowers are raised. All the buildings are lighted by electricity and are supplied with beautiful birds and tropical insects. You can pass from the drawing-room of his mansion to a mosaic-floored, plate-glass-covered promenade and walk for several rods among the vegetable marvels of the tropics. The owner is an excellent botanist and skilful florist, and spends most of his leisure among his plants.

The trade in orchids has reached enormous proportions in England. Larger sums have been paid for orchid roots than were ever given for any specimens of live stock. The most expensive flowers are not always the finest. The price of plants range in the order of their scarcity. Some specimens that readily brought 100 guineas ten years ago can now be bought for a few shillings. A single root of a newly discovered variety will command a fabulous sum. Every person who is trying to get a large collection will endeavor to obtain it. Every portion of the tropics is now being searched by orchid-hunters sent out by the London importers, who have grown rich in the business of obtaining rare specimens. One dealer has sixteen collectors in various parts of tropical South America, Africa, Asia, and the islands in the Pacific and Indian oceans. Their salaries and expenses amount to over $100,000 per year. In their travels and explorations they employ many natives. One of our Consuls in Venezuela reports that the orchid trade is rendering the country prosperous. A poor man will often obtain more for an orchid root procured from a swamp or the branch of a tree than he received for hard labor during a dozen years. Collecting orchids is attended by many dangers and great losses of property. Several collectors in the jungles of India have been devoured by tigers, bitten by venomous serpents, or drowned in bogs. Quite a number have been overturned while in canoes, and it is presumed that several have been roasted and eaten by the cannibals of Polynesia. Many valuable specimens are lost on account of lack of facilities for transportation. One London dealer lately received a telegram from Port Said informing him that 10,000 orchid roots had been killed by exposure to the sun on the Red Sea or by being knocked about during a storm. A collector on one of the Philippine Islands got together 20,000 specimens, which he spread out on the beach to dry, but an unusually high tidal wave swept them all into the sea. Another collector in Peru had his roots in sacks on the backs of mules, which were confiscated by a party of soldiers, who declared they had immediate need of the animals. The soldiers laughed about the orchids having any value. Some things can be said in favor of the orchid mania. It is harmless. So far from injuring the poor in any country, it benefits them. It furnishes employment for many people. It encourages the study of botany, which is the most neglected of all the natural sciences. What is of more consequence [illegible] the world, it is the means of causing many outlandish countries to be explored.—Chicago Times.

ANOTHER NEW INDUSTRY.

How a Lady Makes the Action of Crossing Sweeping Fine.

The Maids' Morning News, according to the St. James' Gazette, gives this little story as the result of its observations of a new industry: On arriving at the crossing at which Lady Bruce Overton presided, I was struck by the neatness and good sense shown in her ladyships' choice of costume. The fair crossing sweeper wore a petticoat of tartan reaching some inches below the knee; thick, black stockings and stout, well-made shoes protected her feet from the mud and wet. A loose sailor body of red velvet, profusely trimmed with fur, and a red velvet cap of liberty, completed a costume that admirably set off the fair beauty of its owner. Lady Overton received me with a charming smile and showed me all her appliances for celerity and dispatch in the sweeping of her crossing. A charming little broom tied with many ribbons attracted my attention, and I inquired the reason of the gay decorations. "Ah," said her ladyship, "I wear ribbons on my broom just as my more luxurious sisters do on their guitars. Each gentleman whom I call my friend presents me with a new and curious ribbon, and I am considered to have a very good collection." "And do you find the work hard?" I inquired. "Oh, dear no," was the answer: "I arrive here about 10 o'clock every morning and find my boy waiting for me; for, of course, I have an experienced sweeper to do the actual hard work. I do the overseeing and the money receiving myself. About 1 o'clock my maid brings me my lunch, and after that the real business of the day begins. From 2 till about 5 a constant stream of passers-by—chiefly gentlemen—put their money into this little basket (showing me a lovely Liberty creation. About 4 I have my tea table spread at the corner here, and many of my friends come at this hour and considerably enliven this part of the street." "And are you making a pecuniary success?" I ask. "What a question!" she replied, laughing; "why, I sometimes take as much as £40 to £50 a day; but, of course, my best time is in the season when all the smart people are in town." "Do you find that your social position has suffered?" I inquired. "Not at all," returned her ladyship, promptly. "At first, I own, my people were rather vexed; but after a time they ceased to object to my work, and are now very pleased at my success. Indeed, I am becoming quite a celebrity, and receive more invitations than I have time to accept. The Prce himself has expressed a wish to make my acquaintance, and, as far as I can see, I am in a fair way to make a large fortune." Her ladyship then wished me good morning, and I walked on, reflecting that no girl who has a little enterprise need despair of making a good living in these enlightened and wide-minded days.

"The main feature of the plan consists in the construction of a tunnel, by which water is to be taken from some distance up the river towards Lake Erie, carried under the town of Niagara, and discharged into the channel of the river below the Falls. It is calculated that out of the seven million horse-power which, it is said, the river can supply, one hundred and nineteen thousand can easily be diverted by the tunnel and utilized to drive a series of turbine wheels, 238 of which, each affording 500 horse-power, will supply as many mills with a motive force which will be unaffected by the weather, cheap and perpetual. The cost of the tunnel and wheel-pits is estimated at $3,000,000."

ELECTRICITY VS. HANGING.

Three Men Convicted of Murder Express a Preference for the Former Mode Execution.

The New York Sun says there are two men in the Tombs convicted of murder—Daniel Lyons, who killed the athlete Quinn and Adolph Reich, who has been found guilty of the murder of his wife. In Brooklyn Jail there is John Greenwald, whose life is demanded for shooting Lyman S. Weeks.

These men have talked freely in answer to the question, "How would you prefer to die—by hanging, or by electricity?" Each one says that if he really must surrender his life he would choose electricity.

Danny Lyons paled just a little at this direct query. "That's a straight question, sure," he said, "but it's fair; it's all right to ask that, for I suppose I'm one of the few, the very few, unfortunate devils in this place or anywhere around here who is best able to answer such a question. Well, I'm for electricity. That seems to me to be the safest for the sheriff and the least cruel to the prisoner. You might say what difference does it make to a man how he dies, as long as he has got to die somehow at some set time. Well, I tell you, it does make a heap of difference. Half the fear would come from the horrible ideas that are connected with hanging and the chances of some slip in the execution.'

"But do you think that the knowledge that death was to come by electricity would take away much of the horror and repulsiveness of capital punishment?"

"Of course I do. A man sits down in a chair, the current is turned on. That ends him. He's dead. But by hanging he may not die for five minutes, perhaps twenty. Then we are accustomed to sitting down in chairs, so that there is nothing ugly in doing that even though a man may know it is a patent chair with a wire fastened to it. But the idea of walking up a gallows and having to stand on a drop, and of waiting for the hangman to fasten the noose and all the other business, is horrible and enough to make a fellow shudder."

Lyons said he would object, however, to the provisions of the Bill that a condemned prisoner shall not know the exact date or hour when the sentence is to be executed.

The Hungarian, Adolph Reich, who has been convicted of killing his wife, said he had seen five men hanged for murder and two men shot as spies in the revolution of 48. He knows what death by the guillotine is like, and his preference, he said, would be the electrical mode. The guillotine he thought too bloody: hanging was barbarous, and not sure and safe, while shooting was associated too much with the idea of war.

John Greenwald, the Brooklyn burglar found guilty of shooting Lyman S. Weeks, said he had pondered on the subject a great deal and had concluded that electricity was the best way and that it ought to be adopted. He has talked with men who have tried to hang themselves, and they have told him that their experiences were frightfully horrible. He believes in electricity because it is sudden and painless. The victim, he says, is killed without torture, except that mental torture which must be the lot of any one sufficiently unlucky to get his life in danger. Greenwald declares that neither method will be tried on him, because he is going to have a new trial, and he is sure he won't be convicted again. If he were really to die by command of the law, he says he would not care to know the day or the hour of the execution of the sentence.

Advice to Young Men.

And then, remember, you have to work. When you handle a pick or a pen, a wheelbarrow or a set of books, digging ditches or editing a paper, ringing an auction bell or writing funny things, you must work. If you look around you, you will see that the men who are most able to live the rest of their lives without work are the men that work the hardest.

Don't be afraid of killing yourself with work. It is beyond your power to do that. Men cannot work so hard as that on the sunny side of 30. They die sometimes, but it's because they quit work at 6 p.m. and don't go home until 2 a.m. It's the interval that kills. Work gives an appetite for meals; it lends solidity to the slumbers; it gives the appreciation of a holiday.

There are men who do not work, but the world is not proud of them. It does not even know their names; it simply speaks of them as old So-and-So's boys. Nobody likes them; nobody hates them; the great, busy world doesn't even know that they are there. So find out what you want to be and do, take off your hat and make a dust in the world. The busier you are the less deviltry you will be apt to get into, the sweeter will be your sleep, the brighter and happier your holidays, and the better satisfied will the world be with you.—Burlington Hawkeye.

The Legs of Great Men in March.

Lord Salisbury was the most sensible man at the last drawing-room. Wisely deeming silk stockings to be out of place on such a wintry day he appeared in the Trinity House uniform, which involves the wearing of trousers. Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville were the first Ministers who made it a regular practice to wear this uniform (which resembles that of an Admiral) at the March functions, and it is certainly more adapted to cold weather than is the full dress of a Privy Counsellor, which, as a rule, is incorrectly described as the Windsor uniform.—London World.

Too Much for Her.

First young lady (confidentially)—That Mr. De Sweet is perfectly awful. He caught me alone in the hall last evening and gave me an awful hug.

Second young lady—Isn't he, though? He did the same thing to me.

"What? To you?"

"Yes; guess it was right after he caught you."

"I'll have the fellow arrested this very day."

Mme. Tussaud has added to her collection of relics the camp bedstead on which the Duke of Wellington slept the night before Waterloo. It is a simple one of ropes and wood, and is barely six feet in length, with the merest pretence to a mattress.

This is how an Austrian paper describes the "fashionable walk in England": "Two or three short hobbling steps and sudden jolt."

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

To Artemesia Readers.

The Advance intends to publish the names of all the Artemesia boys who are now earning their living in places outside this municipality. In our Flesherton boys abroad series a number of names were published which should have gone under the heading, "Artemesia Boys Abroad." We want our readers to furnish the names of those "boys" (or men) who were born in the Township or who have resided in it for a period of at least five years, where they are now, and what they are doing. A post-card about each boy or man will convey to us all the information necessary, as we will have to condense as much as possible.

Our Lacrosse Team.

The Flesherton Lacrosse Club is to the front this year in great shape. On Wednesday evening of last week the members thereof assembled in Booth's barber shop and elected the following officers for the season:—

S. Damude, Esq., President.
Wes. Armstrong, Captain.
T. W. Hollinger, Secretary.
Jos. Gibbons, Treasurer.
T. W. Hollinger, Frank VanDusen, Jos. Armstrong, Man. Committee.

The boys had their first practice on Monday evening, from which it is evident they will give a better account of themselves this season than ever before. The addition of crack players like Messrs. Gibbons, Booth, and Chole will add vastly to the strength of the team.

Another Artemesia Boy Heard From.

We clip the following from the Regina Journal of the 5th inst.:—

"A red letter evening was spent on the 27th at the residence of Mr. H. McKenzie, (Broadview, N. W. T.) where Miss Jane Lucas and Mr. A. S. McKenzie were joined in the holy bonds of matrimony by the Rev. H. McKay, of Round Lake, who, by the way, performed the ceremony most feelingly, and with every consideration for the blushing couple. After the ceremony all sat down to a most sumptuous repast. Here we must acknowledge our pen cannot say too much in praise of our worthy hostess, Mrs. H. McKenzie, if such a thing were possible we would say her generous spirit surpassed itself. After supper the company were regaled by speeches from Mac', sr., delivered in his own inimitable style and songs from Mr. Hillhouse. Who, in the company of such genial spirits as those, could help but enjoy themselves. The gifts to the happy couple were too numerous for us to retail, suffice it to say that they showed clearly the high esteem in which Mr. and Mrs. McKenzie are held by all. The party broke up about 1 o'clock, leaving the best of wishes with the newly wedded pair."

Mr. A. S. McKenzie, referred to above, is the eldest son of our esteemed old friend, Mr. Donald McKenzie—one of Artemesia's most prominent farmers. The Advance extends congratulations to the young people and flings its old slipper after another of Artemesia's stalwart sons and his bride.—Ed.

Fire in Owen Sound.

Owen Sound, April 21.—Last night about eleven o'clock an alarm was sounded from Ward No. 2, and on turning out the brigade found a frame stable had been fired at both ends. This building was ultimately destroyed. The men had gone to their homes and all was quiet till about 1.30, when a second alarm was sounded and a bright light could be seen around Poulette street, where a few doors north of the Molsons' Bank the brick premises of Messrs. G. & J. Meir and James Notter were found in flames. The fire spread rapidly through the buildings, and soon the store of B. Wilcox, adjoining J. & G. Meir's was on fire. Considerable of the stock was saved from each of the stores, but the losses will be heavy. The brick store, owned by Mr. A. Guttin was slightly damaged, but the engine kept a stream of water on the walls and it was saved.

The total loss is estimated at $25,000, partly covered by insurance. The blaze was no doubt the work of an incendiary.

"Come, Gentle Spring."

Tell me, thou that watchest o'er
Gatherers of golden honey
Through the sapphire days and sunny,
Days that now we see no more,
Where have fled those toilers belted
With refulgent bands of amber?
Leafless are the vines that clamber
Where they revel hold of yore.
Filched the rare ambrosia melted
In the honeysuckle bells;
Drained the nectar from the cells
Of the zenith-looking lily;
While the winds through wan and chilly
Hours around us rage and roar.
They have robbed the year of sweetness,
Leaving us its ashen core;
Have they followed thee with fleetness,
Holding still their wealth in store?
In our visions we behold—
While the stinging storm-shafts hurtle
O'er the buried beds of myrtle—
All thy honey's liquid gold,
Drained from asphodels of old
Where Arcadian fountains spurtle
Cruel, cruel, thus to flaunt us
Through the chill of wintry night!
Cruel, cruel, thus to haunt us
With sweet visions of delight!
Come, we pray thee, come and bring Back thy troop and sky-fields sunny;
We would quaff the year's fresh honey
From the chalice of the spring!

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

She clung to Guy in a paroxysm of terror at the thought, the only clear one now in her bewildered brain. "I am not his wife—it is impossible! No, no, Guy, do not leave me to him—take me away—take me away!"

She hid her face on his breast, trembling convulsively in every limb, while Guy bowed his head over hers in an agony as great as her own, his strong frame trembling with the suppressed rage and fury which burned in his heart when he thought of the misery before her.

"Guy"—lifting her head and meeting his sorrowful eyes—"forgive me! I forgot! I won't pain you, dear, any more. My head seems so strange and confused that I do not know what I am saying. Why did I come? I walked all the way, you know. Oswald helped me—he was very good; but he could not help its being so cold, you know. And when I fell he said, 'Come back—come home.' But I knew that I must come, that if I did not something dreadful—" Again the trembling seized her, and her voice died away on the parched lips, but her eyes still looked upward to his. "Ah, I remember! Guy, you will not—there is something I have to ask you—you will come away from here—you will not—oh, Guy"—she slid down from his arms and sunk at his feet, holding out her little, eager, supplicating hands—"oh, Guy, if you ever loved me—I can see the danger in your face, and—and—it terrifies me! Oh, Guy, come away come away!"

She was clinging to him as she knelt at his feet in a very delirium of terror, her hands upraised, her hair sweeping the ground. Bending, Guy strove to raise her, but she resisted.

"No, no, I will kneel here! Oswald, help me to plead. Do you not see—do you not see—"

"Shirley, dear, Guy will come away. Be calm, child; you will only make yourself ill."

Captain Fairholme had come to her side, [illegible] soothingly. He saw that the girl's mind was almost unhinged with misery, and the fever-light in her eyes terrified him.

"Do you not see?" she repeated, piteously. "He will kill him! Oswald, make him go; he has suffered so much that his misery has—"

"This scene must end," said Sir Hugh, advancing. "Major Stuart, if you have any pity for this poor child, who is evidently so terribly upset by all the excitement she has undergone that she is not conscious of what she is saying, you will leave us. I am at your service whenever you like to call upon me. You can leave my wife to my care now."

"Go, Guy, for Heaven's sake, and end this scene! It is killing Shirley," Oswald said entreatingly, for his cousin's condition was alarming him greatly; the fever of her mind was struggling against her physical exhaustion, and she clung to him, panting and breathless, in her agony of terror.

"To leave her thus!" cried Guy bitterly. "How can I? Fairholme, put yourself in my place. To leave her to that dastard, who has so cruelly betrayed us both! Why did you let her come? I claim a man's right to vengeance. Even his life would not be a sufficient—"

"You are talking madly," interrupted Oswald. "What vengeance can you take that will not fall most heavily upon her? Ah, surely she has suffered enough! Will you add to her misery? It would be kinder to tear her limb from limb than let her suffer this! And you say you love her!"

Guy Stuart stood silent, his hands clinched, his head bent, his breathing loud and fast. To let go his vengeance was harder than to part with his own life. To forgive the man who had so terribly wronged him was beyond his strength. The very sight of the livid changed face lying against Oswald's shoulder goaded him to madness. While her life should last she must suffer through that man! Could any vengeance be too great? Would any cost be counted if he could be made to suffer in his turn?

He lifted his eyes and turned them full upon his betrayer, and under the hate and bitterness of that look Sir Hugh, brave as he was, felt the color leave his face. A bitter cry of anguish and despair rang through the room.

"He will not hear me—he never loved me! Oh, Guy—oh, Guy!"

At the broken wailing words Guy turned to her, and, as his eyes rested upon her, all the anger died out of them, and a yearning heart-broken tenderness replaced it. He looked at her for a moment, the girl he loved so wildly, and who had been stolen from him by so base a theft, the girl who was another man's wife; then he turned away and covered his face with his hands, and there was breathless silence in the room, during which, had its occupants been less absorbed, they might have heard the sound of rapidly approaching wheels.

For a minute no one moved or spoke; then Shirley crept to Guy's side and raised her fingers to his hands as they were clasped before his face. At the touch, light as it was, a shiver ran through the strong frame, and he uncovered his face and stood erect.

"I will go," he said hoarsely. "It is better—I will. No, my darling—how can I take you with me? You are his wife, remember."

She had clasped her hands round his arm; but at the words, so heart-rending in their bitter anguish, so hopeless in their misery, the little clinging fingers fell away, and she drew back with a puzzled look.

"Guy," she said faintly; "have you forgotten how to love me? Are you angry? Have I vexed you?"

"Dear, do you forget?" he asked pitifully, as he made his way toward the door, moving like a man suddenly stricken with blindness, Shirley following with the same wistful, puzzled look, which made Oswald watch her with a nameless fear.

At the door Guy paused, with trembling hands for the handle, not daring to look at Shirley, and feeling that he could have faced death more easily than those wondering, shining eyes.

"Guy, you will not go without me?" she said piteously. "You will not leave me here? Ah"—with a cry that rang through the room—"I forgot—I forgot!"

Not daring to hesitate, Guy opened the door, and went out into the hall, where two ladies—Lady Capel and her daughter—came forward eagerly as he appeared, but whom he passed without recognition. They uttered a simultaneous exclamation of distress, and hurried into the library, and, while one ran to Shirley and caught her in her arms, the other turned to Oswald.

"For Heaven's sake, follow him!" Lady Capel said hurriedly. "He needs you most!"

Oswald obeyed without a word; and, with a glance at her daughter, who was crying passionately, with her arms round Shirley, whose eyes were dry and wild and vacant, and who paid no heed to Ruby's tears and caresses, her ladyship addressed Sir Hugh—

"You must pardon this intrusion, Sir Hugh; but my daughter was in such distress about Shirley—she feared she was ill, and—"

"No apology is needed," Sir Hugh said, an expression of intense relief on his countenance as he went forward. "No words can express my gratitude for your kindness, Lady Capel. I fear indeed that this has been too much for Shirley, and I will gladly leave her in your care. I will send my housekeeper to you."

He left the room, and, as he crossed the hall, Shirley's shrill laughter followed him, and he heard her voice asking Ruby, in a puzzled tone, why she was crying, what was she sorry about, and to see how happy she was, and to listen— Then came that shrill, dreadful laughter again.

CHAPTER XXV.

"Is it not time they were here, Dickson?"

"In about half an hour, sir," said the attendant's grave respectful voice; and Sir Jasper Stuart moved uneasily on his pillows. It was so hard to wait when time was so short with him now. It might be measured by hours, even by minutes.

In the great bedchamber of the stately London House the fire glowed brightly, and the lamp burned with a soft subdued lustre which did not distress the dim eyes of the invalid who lay there, half raised upon his pillows, with yearning impatience upon his face, a face over which the shadow of death was creeping slowly but surely.

But even that shadow and that yearning could not quite dim the light of expectation and hope which shone so brightly over the aged countenance, one which even now showed some of the great beauty which had been Sir Jasper's portion. The features, sharpened though they were, were regular and shapely, the masses of white hair were thrown back from his forehead, and the gray eyes, dim and fast growing sightless now, had been the counterpart of Guy's. And the face, which in his youth had been so grand, was grand still with the endurance which was upon it, with its brow all patience and its lips all pain.

For nearly the whole of his long life, Sir Jasper Stuart had been an invalid, paralyzed and crippled from his manhood, and nobly he had borne his suffering, nobly conquered the rebellious thoughts which were so apt to rise. Until the accident by which he had been laid low, his strength had been even greater than the average, and he had enjoyed life with all the zest given by his superb manhood and his cloudless fortune; but suddenly and swiftly the burden of pain and suffering and weary inaction had been laid upon him, and he had taken it up as gallantly, with as brave a smile and as dauntless a front as any knight of old. And now he was about to lay it down, and he was glad to be free of its pain and weariness at last.

Within all was bright and warm and noiseless, without in the London square the winter storm raged violently. The hail and sleet dashed against the windows, the wind roared ceaselessly, and ever and again a flash of lightning gleamed through the darkness. Sir Jasper, leaning back, listened to the swiftly falling hail and the moaning howling wind.

"It is a bad night for them to come home," he said presently. "But they won't be thinking of the wind and hail. Has Owens gone yet, Dickson?"

"The carriage has just started, Sir Jasper."

"Has Mrs. James everything ready for them, Dickson?"

"Mrs. James has surpassed herself, Sir Jasper. There is not a servant in the house who would not do their best to welcome Major Stuart and his lady."

"He will be a good master to you when I am gone, Dickson, and I hope you will serve him as faithfully as you have served me. It would have been pleasant," he added with a faint smile, "to see his young wife flitting about the old rooms, brightening them with the sunshine of her sweet presence; but it is not to be, and I am quite content."

There was a pause then, during which the old man's dim eyes were fixed upon a sketch which lay before him, a sketch of Shirley Ross in her fur cap and jacket, which Guy had drawn one day and had given to his uncle, who had smiled at his eloquent description of Shirley's beauty.

"She is very lovely," he murmured to himself; "and she looks true. I am glad my boy will be so happy."

The minutes slipped by, the hail ceased, and the moaning of the wind seemed to lessen. Suddenly Dickson rose.

"The carriage has returned, Sir Jasper," he said quietly.

"Ah, that is well! The time seems to go so slowly when one waits."

Two minutes more passed, and then on the stairs without sounded a footstep, and into Sir Jasper's dying eyes came a gleam of intense eagerness. The door of his room opened quietly, and a tall man entered, crossed the room with rapid step, and knelt down by the bedside. Sir Jasper's eyes met his in eager love; then they went beyond him to seek the other form he so much wished to see, and came back, wistful and questioning, to rest on his nephew's face.

"Uncle Jasper"—Guy's voice, eager, tender, and unsteady, broke the silence first—"you expected me, did you not?"

"Not you only, dear lad," said the old man, whose eyes, dim as they were, saw the terrible change in the face of the man whom he loved so tenderly.

"You are glad to see me, sir?"

"When am I not glad, Guy?"

"And you are—not worse, I hope? You have not been suffering much? Where is Dickson? I should like to ask him——"

The old man's fingers touched his nephew's and stopped the nervous restless speech, and Guy, who had risen, resumed his old position, kneeling beside the bed.

"I have not been suffering," Sir Jasper said gently. "Sit down, lad; you must be weary.'

Guy obeyed at once, throwing himself into an arm-chair by the bed, and trying to screen his face from the keen eyes which were reading all its pain and all its unrest.

"You are alone, my boy?"

"Yes, Uncle Jasper."

"Guy, my dear lad, what is that pain upon your face?"

Guy's head sunk upon his breast; he could not speak falsely to his uncle now, and yet how could he pain him by the story he had to tell?

"You have had some great trouble since I saw you, lad," went on the tender sympathizing voice—and Guy's fingers closed over the cold hand in his with a convulsive pressure. "Tell it me, Guy."

"It is nothing. You need not be troubled for me, Uncle Jasper," Guy said huskily.

"Nothing! Ah, lad, I can believe my old eyes still!" he answered, smiling faintly. "Do not be afraid to tell me, Guy."

"I have been troubled; but it is over," Guy said steadily. "Do not think of it, sir. Let us speak of something else."

"It will not hurt you to tell me, lad, nor will it hurt me to hear. Nothing can hurt me now, you know, because I am so near the border of that land where all dark places will be made light and all rough places smooth. Tell me, lad—why is not Shirley with you?"

Guy winced. The mention of her name probed the open wound and gave him keen pain.

"She has not deceived you, lad?"

"She? No, poor child!" Guy said bitterly.

"Then you are saved the cruelest pang of all, Guy. There is no pain so hard to bear as that brought by the knowledge of the unworthiness of one we love."

"Shirley is worthy of the truest love any man could give her," Major Stuart said huskily. "But, Uncle Jasper, why need you be troubled? I must get over it as best I can, and I must try to forget the happy dreams I have dreamed lately."

"Forget them! Why?"

"Because—because they have stolen her from me."

"Stolen her from you, Guy! Who has done this, lad?"

"One who called himself my friend."

"Your friend! Tell me all, Guy. I can bear any trouble better than this suspense and ignorance of what is grieving you."

And, simply, and with as little bitterness as he could, Guy told him all. The old man listened in silence, only the feeble pressure of his thin fingers over Guy's strong ones showing what he felt, and once or twice a sudden gleam of anger flashing into his dim eyes. Wrong, insult, injury to himself he could have borne, but injury to Guy cut him deeper far.

"My poor boy, my poor boy!" he said, as Guy's head sunk upon his hands in uncontrollable emotion. "It was a cruel deed."

"Cruel. Could any vengeance be too great for that dastard's crime?" Guy said passionately. "Tell me, Uncle Jasper—you who can judge dispassionately would it be more than justice if I laid him dead at my feet? If a man attacks you in a fair fight, you can meet him and defend yourself: but a vile traitor who stabs you in the dark, who takes your hand in friendship, meaning to betray you basely, who takes from the one precious thing which gladdens your life—what punishment great Heaven, what punishment could be severe enough for him? If I slew him, I should be too merciful," he said between his teeth; then, meeting the sorrowful dim eyes, he made a strong effort to regain his self-control. "Forgive me, dear Uncle Jasper!" he said, bending toward him. "I was wrong to startle you thus—very wrong."

"You were wrong—very wrong," his uncle answered quietly—"but not because you startled me. Guy, have you forgotten the words, 'Vengeance is Mine; I will repay?'"

"But such perfidy, such treachery!" said the young man, panting with the might of his passion for vengeance, which he strove in vain to conceal. "No murder could have been so vile. A murderer kills the body, but he has killed my soul."

"Hush, for Heaven's sake. Be silent, Guy!"

Guy's bronzed face paled to the hue of death at the entreaty and pain in the feeble voice, his lips trembled, and the flash of madness died out of his eyes.

"Forgive me, Uncle Jasper; but, ah, if you knew how I loved her, and how she is suffering."

"I know how you loved her, Guy; for once I loved even as you do, and I know how you both suffer," Sir Jasper said brokenly. "Every step of this weary road over which you are walking I have trodden, every pang you have suffered I have known—every pang, but intensified a hundredfold, because, while you can honor Shirley still, I found my idol was nothing but clay."

"Uncle Jasper!" Low and broken and pained were the words now; the madness was dying out of his heart; the greatness of his grief was not lessened, but it was calmed by the words, so solemnly tender, so deeply sad, which he had heard.

"I was a younger man than you, Guy, when I loved even as you loved, and thought that I was loved in return. But I was wrong. She pretended to love me, and one day I found out my mistake. It is a long story; but I need not give you its details now, Guy. The man who won her from me was my friend, and it was to him I owed the accident which made me what you have known me—a helpless cripple."

An exclamation of pain and horror broke from Major Stuart's lips.

"Yes," Sir Jasper went on, in his grave, pained, weary voice, "but for him, I should have been as other men, Guy—strong and healthy, able to enjoy life and see good days. He took from me the woman I loved; he deprived me forever of health and strength, of the dear and close ties of marriage. What woman, even had she loved me, could I have asked to share my life? Had I no cause for vengeance, Guy? And yet, when it was in my reach, when, years after, it was in my power to avenge myself fully, to strike every joy he possessed from his hand, even as he had taken them from mine, to shiver to the dust the honors and successes he had won, I refrained. Ah, Guy, dear lad, there is a nobler justice than the justice of revenge! What mercy dare we look for if we grant none? Lying here, 'with the light from the windows of my Father's mansion shining upon my homeward path,' I can look back thankfully to the past, whereas——"

He sunk back exhausted; he had spoken with unusual passion and earnestness, and the feeble frame was not equal to such emotion. Guy bent over him, lifting him in his strong arms and supporting him tenderly during the paroxysm of pain which followed. As he laid him down again, the dying eyes met his with a living light in them.

"Guy, you will forgive me. Ah, it is hard, I know! But do not think that he will not suffer; he will regret his baseness bitterly. How can he be happy if he loves her and sees her misery? Lad, do you remember"—the dying face was serene once more as the dying eyes lingered on Guy's softened face—"the play we read together so long ago, and which you liked so well? Ah, Guy, 'how would you be, if He which is the top of judgment should but judge you as you are?' Forgive him, lad. Promise me you will never seek to harm him—promise—promise, Guy."

The room was very silent for a space: the light fell upon both faces from the light above them, Sir Jasper's grave, earnest, pleading, Guy's softened truly but full of bitter resentment still. It was bitter as death itself to give that promise. Hugh had been merciless to him—why should he show him mercy? But, looking at the dying man who loved him, and who had borne a long life of pain so uncomplainingly—who, when revenge lay between his fingers, in the hollow of his hand, had laid it aside—he saw to what nobility a man can attain, he saw how much greater even than revenge was the conquest which had made him king over himself.

The door opened softly to admit Dickson, who came to the bedside noiselessly, then retreated again at a sign from the dying man. He went out quietly, his eyes dim and his lips trembling; the shadow had grown very dark and heavy, that falling shadow of death. The hail had ceased and the sound of the wind was lowered and rain fell.

"Will you not promise me, lad?"

"I promise, Uncle Jasper," Guy said brokenly: and a light of joy, so bright, so vivid, that for a moment it dispersed the gathering darkness, shone on the dying face.

"Thank you, lad; you have made me very happy, Guy."

The stillness deepened, the gray shadow crept over the suffering face; death was coming fast now.

"Poor lad!" murmured the pale lips. "You will be very lonely. I had so hoped!"

"You do not suffer?" Guy asked bending over him.

"No; all suffering is nearly over for me."

His eyes were closed, but he opened them suddenly, and looked long and lingeringly at the face of the man he loved so well.

"Kiss me lad," he whispered.

Guy bent down and touched with his own the bearded lips which had claimed the promise from him. A smile crept into the dying eyes and, reaching the mouth, lingered there. A long-drawn sigh rose from the lips, the weary limbs straightened themselves for their last rest, and, as the storm died in the distance and the wind lulled, the long life of pain was over, and Sir Jasper Stuart was at rest.

At rest, with a smile upon his serene face—at rest, having obtained a promise which was of greater worth than even he had guessed; and the man whom he loved, and who was left alone in the wide world, longed with a bitter hopeless longing to leave the torture of life and rest there by his side.

A King in a Cupboard.

Old Mother Hubbard, or somebody else recently went to a cupboard in the royal palace at Madrid and found the future King of Spain. Little Alphonso had been left in charge of his sisters, who deserted him after a time. The royal baby thereupon crawled into a cupboard, the door of which was afterwards closed by some one who did not know that the child was inside. Nurses, grooms, butlers, pages, scullions, soldiers, relatives, back-stair potentates and front-hall flunkies, grandees, dons and door-keepers, searched the palace for His Majesty. At last he was found, and the throbbing nerves of a great people were stilled by a sensation of joy.

A Case of Spontaneous Combustion.

The Victoria Colonist mentions a peculiar case of spontaneous combustion which happened recently in that city. A merchant named Gordon was in his office one night when a flame broke out in another part of the premises. He rushed over to the place and found that an ordinary vulcanized rubber ring which had been brought up from the cellar during the day and placed on an empty cracker box, had taken fire. It was quite alone, and the only tenable theory of the combustion was that it was spontaneous.

In the presence of hundreds of people, on one of the busiest thoroughfares in Chicago, Simon Rosenfield, a travelling salesman, stabbed himself to the heart on Saturday afternoon and fell to the sidewalk dead. He was talking with two friends, neither of whom suspected his intention or knew the cause of the act. He has friends in Detroit.

EDIBLE BIRDS' NESTS.

An Important Industry Among the Anamese Natives.

Travellers going from Hong Kong to Bangkok or Singapore by steamer pass along the coast of Anam and near a group of islands that are at once picturesque and curious, says the San Francisco Chronicle. Swallows' nests are a source of riches to the region. Their value is said to have been discovered some hundreds of years ago during the reign of Gia Long, who promised a liberal reward to any one who would discover a new and profitable article of export within this realm. The nests discovered on the island of Nam Ngai were presented to the sovereign, who, faithful to his promise, offered a patent of nobility to the finder. This was respectfully declined, and instead a monopoly of the harvest was accepted by the discoverer for himself and his descendants. The privileged family was to pay yearly 80 pounds of the nests to the emperor as royalty. On the other hand they were to be exempt from personal taxes, from military service and from contributions of personal labor, such as are common in oriental countries. They formed a family league of 40 or 50 men, elected two of their number as leaders, under the title of gnan and dot, and founded a village convenient for their commerce, which still exists under the name of Yen Xa—"Village of the Swallows' Nests." The nests are the product of a salivary secretion of the birds. As to their mercantile value they are divided into three distinct categories. The most valuable are those into which there enters a certain proportion of blood. These are called yen huyet. Singularly enough, they can only be produced by the birds which are affected with a malady resembling consumption and which is attended by copious hemorrhage. Nests of this kind are in great demand. They are rare and gathered only in the spring. Local tradition says that these birds die of exhaustion or of the consumption in its advanced stages, before the end of the second winter. Scientists being scarce among the Anamese, and the French colonists not having yet had sufficient time for observation, it is not known whether this disease is peculiar only to a part of the birds, or whether the salivary secretion that causes the malady causes the death of all of them after a year or two of existence. The smallness of the quantity of these nests annually gathered—which is only three or four pounds—would seem to indicate that the disease is only partial and peculiar to those possessed of the weakest lungs. All the other nests (yan sao) are classed as second quality. Nothing but the saliva of the birds enters into their construction. They are gathered in the spring, summer and autumn. The spring harvest is the most valuable because it includes the two qualities. Two nests of the first quality weigh one ounce, and are worth at the place of production five Mexican dollars at current value in Anam. Those of the second quality are worth little more than half as much. Nearly all the nests are sold to the Chinese living in the cities of Anam and Tonquin, or sent to Chinese ports. Only the Chinese and some mandarins of the court of Hue, who prefer the Chinese cuisine, can afford the luxury. They are eaten by the Chinese cooked with flesh or with sugar, having been first cleaned of all extraneous substances by a liberal application of hot water. When cooked with fowl or game, fruit of the water-lily is added. Chinese physicians prescribe them as a sovereign remedy for diseases of the lungs, asthma, disordered digestion and most other maladies.

A New Club.

Husband (irritably)—You have been talking with your neighbor across the fence just four hours.

Wife (composedly)—Well, suppose I have. Don't you think we women have as much right to talk over our affairs as you men have to talk over yours?

H.—Yes; but goodness gracious, four hours!

W.—Well, we were talking of forming a club.

H. A club! What kind of a club?

W. —An anti-gossip club.

There are five insane women confined in the Middlesex County Jail. One of them, Keturah Harrison, broke the cell windows on Saturday with her bare fists, but, strange to say, escaped injury. Mrs. Ponsfield, who has been in the prison for three years, is thought to be near her death.

Arthur Beaulieu was committed at Montreal Saturday morning to the Court of Queen's Bench on an indictment for attempt to murder Zozime Masson, at whom he threw a pair of heavy tongs at the C. P. R. shops on the 10th of January last. The doctor reported that Masson was dying at the hospital.

An east-bound freight train on the Grand Trunk broke an axle last night about four miles west of Brighton, at the place known as "The Dangers." Eleven cars were wrecked. It will probably take all night to clear the track. Last night's through express from Montreal was detained at Cobourg in consequence of the accident. No one was injured.

A serious accident occurred on Saturday near Marthaville. Mr. J. A. Cook, editor of the Petrolea Topic, and Mr. Joseph Alexander, proprietor of the Tecumseh House, were out driving. Their horse took fright and ran away, throwing the occupants of the carriage out. Mr. Alexander had his leg broken in two places and Mr. Cook received injuries around the head and had some of his ribs fractured.

Make Childhood Sweet.

Wait not till the little hands are at rest
  Ere you fill them full of flowers;
Wait not for the crowning tuberose
  To make sweet the last sad hours;
But while in the busy household band,
Your darlings still need your guiding hand,
  Oh, fill their lives with sweetness!

Wait not till the little hearts are still,
  For the loving look and phrase;
But while you gently chide a fault
  The good deed kindly praise.
The word you would speak beside the bier
Falls sweeter far on the living ear;
  Oh, fill young lives with sweetness!

Ah, what are kisses on cold clay lips
  To the rosy mouth we press,
When our wee one flies to her mother's arms
  For love's tenderest caress!
Let never a worldly bauble keep
Your heart from the joy each day should reap
  Circling young lives with sweetness.

Give thanks each morn for the sturdy boys,
  Give thanks for the fairy girls;
With a dower of wealth like this at home
  Would you rifle the earth for pearls?
Wait not for death to gem love's crown,
But daily shower life's blessings down
  And fill young hearts with sweetness.

Remember the homes where the light has fled,
  Where the rose has faded away,
And the love that glows in youthful hearts,
  Oh, cherish it while you may!
And make your home a garden of flowers,
Where joy shall bloom through childhood's hours
  And fill young lives with sweetness.

PICTURES OF CHILDREN.

Suggestions to Mothers Who Wish to Go to the Galleries.

"Only one person should go with a child when it is to be photographed," said a camera artist. Then he went on: No attempt should be made to get a child photographed in any but bright weather. The middle of the day is the best time for a sitting. Children should always wear light-colored frocks when sitting for pictures. Light tones harmonize with their complexions, and photograph in less time than darker hues. Navy blue, seal brown, dark green, wine color, maroon and cardinal all take dark. Light green, brown, scarlet, gray and purple take light. Rose color, lavender, yellow and pale blue nearly white. In white material the cream tint is more desirable than pure white. Black silk or velvet take as dark as ink. It is as easy to get good pictures of children as of grown folk if people would attire the little ones in suitable colors and simple style, not make them nervous before they reach the studio and leave them entirely to the operator after they are there. Grown people would secure more satisfactory pictures of themselves, too, if they'd trust more to the operator's judgment and less to their own. People ought to think about the details of their dress and hair arrangement before they come in front of the camera. As a rule the more simple the attire and coiffure the more pleasing and natural the picture. Proofs should never be examined in a bright light as they fade so rapidly. It is no guide to the photographer to send back two or three proofs with the message, "Finish from the darkest one," or "the lightest one," for they are all liable to be of the same shade when they reach him.

A Question for Philologists.

Dr. Crabb, of White River, Kentucky, in a note to the editors of the St. Louis Medical and Surgical Journal, says: "I am acquainted with a couple of twin boys, 7 years old, that can understand each other, and although it is impossible for their parents or any other person to understand one word that they say, they make their language intelligible to each other. I also know of twin girls, 16 years old, that can talk to each other, and to another person their language would convey as little meaning as the ancient Hebrew would to a person who had never learned that language, although the young ladies mentioned can use a great many words common to the English language in talking with other people, but in conversation with each other they use a language of their own invention and peculiar to themselves."

"Willie," said the good pastor, who was taking dinner with the family, "I suppose you will be a literary man like your father when you grow up." "Nope," said the little boy addressed, as he looked at the somewhat meagre array of delicacies on the table, with lofty scorn, "literary nuthin'! I'm goin' to be a ten-thousand-dollar cook!"

CURRENT TOPICS.

A London dealer in birds prepared for the adornment of ladies' bonnets makes the statement that last year he sold 2,000,000 of them, ranging in variety from the robin and the wood pigeon to the splendid tropical bird.

A recent traveller through the Chinese Province of Manchusia says that besides having a reverence for animals the rustic Manchus worship diseases, and particularly the smallpox, which is represented under the form of a repulsive idol.

The history of Saratoga, Kan., gives one an idea of the stability of a "boom" in many of the western towns. A year ago it had a population of 2,500, and a fair prospect of becoming the county seat. But another town secured the prize, and now there are only 150 people who claim Saratoga as their home.

The tercentenary of the translation of the Bible into Welsh is to be celebrated this year by erecting a memorial to the translator, Bishop Morgan, at St. Asaph, and by establishing a Welsh scholarship for Biblical learning. It is also intended to issue a reprint of Bishop Morgan's Bible, with the Revised Version in a parallel column.

One of the most ingenious inventions of the day is the self-registering thermometer which a famous London firm announces. It consists of an indicator which can be set up in any greenhouse. When the temperature falls below the point at which injury would be caused to plants an electric bell is set in motion, so that the alarm is at once given.

There is surely nothing new under the sun. It is now learned that the gambling game in which the players place coins on the ground before them and bet on the probability of a fly lighting on a particular coin has been known to the people of Central Asia for centuries, and is probably a heritage that they have received from their prehistoric Aryan ancestors.

An old Confederate soldier who has been indulging in reminiscences recalls the time when all the whiskey in Macon, Ga., was poured into the streets to prevent the Federal troops from capturing it. The gutters overflowed with the precious fluid, and in places on the pavements it was ankle deep. The soldiers attempted to scoop up the liquor in their tin cups, but a guard with fixed bayonets lined the streets and kept them back.

A French physician mentions a curious case of left-handedness. One child in a certain family was left-handed and a second appeared at the age of one year also to be left-handed. It was then learned that the mother always carried her child on her left arm. She was advised to carry the child on her right. The infant, having its right arm free, began to grasp at objects with it and soon became left-handed.

The Republic of Chili is going largely into railroad building. Two lines are building across the continent to connect Chili with the Argentine Republic. These are being constructed by private companies with the help of Government subsidies. But the Government manages the internal railroad system itself, and to this it is now about to add eight hundred miles of new lines at an expenditure of $17,000,000.

The reports from steamships recently arriving from Europe indicate that the Atlantic is becoming comparatively placid, at least in the "steamer lanes." The late severe storms have generally moved north of these routes, probably losing much of their energy upon entering the cold ocean areas northeast of Newfoundland. This intelligence will be grateful to the rapidly increasing number of Canadians now going to Europe.

In her lecture in New York the other night, Mrs. Ashton Dilke referred to the way Lady Randolph Churchill helped Mr. Bartlett, husband of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, in his canvass for Parliament. One tradesman upon whom she called bethought himself of the old times when the fair Duchess of Devonshire is reported to have bartered a kiss for a tradesman's vote. The man upon whom Lady Churchill called hinted at this, and she said, "Why, certainly; I'll tell the Baroness Burdett-Coutts what you wish." As the paragraphers used to say, "Phancy his pheelinx!"

Dr. P. Lange, in a paper read before the Electrical Convention on "How to protect watches against the influence of magnetism," said: "In my work as an investigator of this subject, which has extended over a period of several months, I have formed three separate solutions of the problem; (1) To have the watch made of material that cannot be magnetized; (2) to inclose the works in an iron case, so as to shield the vital parts of the watch; and (3) to apply efficient means to demagnetize the watch that has not been favored with the safeguards."

There is a commercial age in which the most important changes in the social system of nations may depend upon the fraction of a penny, which, being considered by itself, might seem to be an insignificant factor. For instance, what might have been the reply of an ordinary British observer in the year 1869 had anyone then said to him in England, "If President Vanderbilt, of the New York Central Railroad, can reduce the cost of moving provisions a ha'penny per ton per mile on the consolidated railway line which he has just organized between New York and Chicago, it will change all the conditions of agriculture and will profoundly affect the existing order of society in Great Britain."

Before Sir Morell Mackenzie set out on his last mission to San Remo, the correspondent of the Liverpool Post says, he had received from the Crown Prince fees amounting to £3,000. The prolongation of the life of his patient till he has become German Emperor will, it is expected, greatly increase the prospects of the English expert's further remuneration. Sir Morell Mackenzie has seen one or two patients who have followed him to San Remo, and it is probable that this practice will be continued during his stay in Berlin. But practically he has had to abandon his large practice and concentrate his efforts and attention upon the case of the Emperor.

A well-informed Vienna paper states in a letter from St. Petersburg that the Tzarewitch will shortly be betrothed to the Princess Militza, daughter of Prince Nicholas of Montenegro. The Tzar (according to the London Times correspondent) is said to be resolved that the heir to the throne shall marry a Princess born in the Russian orthodox faith, and an article is to be added to the fundamental laws which regulate the Imperial House making this condition imperative as regards all future heirs to the throne. Hitherto the heirs to the Russian throne have married Lutherans or Calvinists, who became converted and were rebaptized before the wedding day. In future, should the reported Imperial intention be enforced, the Empresses of Russia will have to be chosen from among the Princesses of Russia, Servia, Roumania, Montenegro or Greece.

In New York there is one physician to about 400 people; in Paris one to about 1,475. In the whole of France there is about one physician to 3,000 inhabitants; in England one to every 1,500, and in the United States one to every 750.

An engagement of note in diplomatic circles, which has just been announced, is that of Miss Flora West, second daughter of the English Minister Sir Lionel Sackville West at Washington, to Mr. Gabriel Salanson, Third Secretary of the French Legation. The Misses West sail for France on the 21st of April, and the wedding will probably take place in Paris before their return.

Medicomania, according to the London Lancet, is the latest Parisian craze. It consists in a mania for medical and surgical curiosities, and even operations. The scenes of the dead-house, the dissecting-room and surgical theatre, all matters of purely professional interest, have, thanks, no doubt, to a diseased realism in the world of fiction, become the spectacle of the hour, the twin diversion with social small talk.

Immediately after Emperor Frederick left San Remo the Sultan sent him a collar, consisting of nine hazel nuts with inscriptions from the Koran, over which the dervishes and sheiks of the palace had prayed and which, as the Sultan assured the Crown Prince, would cure him as if by magic. The usual way of treating a patient in Turkey is for the doctor to write on a slip of paper a verse from the Koran suited to the case, then wash the ink off with water, which is administered to the patient. Faith cure is nothing new.

Fruits in general contain but little nutriment, but are of value as a food from their appetizing and pleasant taste; from their supplying in an agreeable way water necessary to food, and from the gentle laxative effect of the acid present. In addition, both fruits and vegetables supply the body with potash. In this way they counteract the scurvy engendered by a diet of salted meats. The only methods of preserving foods known to the ancients were drying and salting, both of which fail to preserve the flavor.

In the current number of "Science" there is published a reproduction of letters written to Prof. A. Graham Bell by Helen Keller, a little girl of 7 years, who is totally blind and deaf and dumb. She has been under the instruction of Miss Annie Sullivan for just one year, the only means of conveying the information to her being the sense of touch, yet the letter is clearly and intelligently written, and, indeed, is as good as any intelligent child of her age could be expected to write, even with the aid of all the senses. A picture of Helen and her teacher, Miss Sullivan, engaged in talking, through clasped hands, is also given.

The King of Dahomey, according to Labouchere, has considerably embarrassed the invalid King of Portugal by sending him a present of half a dozen negro girls, with a message that they had been selected from the prettiest, plumpest damsels in his dominions. On reaching Lisbon these nymphs were attired much after the fashion of the garden of Eden, but they have since been decorously dressed by order of King Louis. They were first sent to the marine barracks, where they were kept for a few days in a carefully guarded wing, but this arrangement caused scandal, so they were relegated to a house in the botanical gardens, where they still remain.

A newly patented pavement is said to have been suggested by the surface of an elephant's tooth, which consists of intermingled layers of hard and soft material, so that the process of wearing always produces a series of ridges upon the surface. The new system of paving is the idea of Mr. Ranyard, the English astronomer, and comprises the use of blocks having alternate hard and soft layers such as Portland cement and a mixture of sand and cement—which are set upon edge, so that the edges of these laminæ form a wearing surface. The blocks are made four inches high, and may be worn to less than an inch high, and may be worn less than an inch without becoming smooth like granite blocks.

The Gulf Stream Blown Out to Sea.

Captain Griffin, of the barkentine Clara McGilvery, which arrived in port on Thursday from Porto Rico, says that the Gulf Stream is more than sixty miles out of its usual course. It is supposed that the recent blizzard has had some effect in driving the stream to the eastward and southward of where it is usually found. Captain Griffin says that a cold current of water surrounds the stream, registering as low as 40° Fahrenheit. Masters of vessels bound from Cuba to New York and Philadelphia have been warned of this great change. In order to get the full benefit and strength of the current, vessels must keep at least one degree to the eastward of the usual course. The McGilvery encountered hurricanes on four occasions on the trip up from Cuba, and narrowly escaped destruction.—Philadelphia Record.

Women Inventors in England.

Women are beginning to appear on the list of applicants for patents in England. Among the patentees of a week ago were Louisa Laurence, of London, for an invention of "improvements in letter and bill files;" Elizabeth Aspinwall, of Birkenhead, for an invention of "polishing and cleaning laundry irons and flat irons;" Florence King, of West Kensington Park, for an invention of "feeding-spoons for infants and invalids."

SHE MUST GO.

The Pretty Typewriter Forced Out by Her Homely Sister.

"This is the day of the homely girl," said the Principal of a typewriting school in New York to me the other day. "The beauty, the belle, the dressy girl, all are at a discount in this business, and we have resolved never to employ another pretty girl if we can get a homely one.

"There's no mystery about it," he continued. "It's plain business. There are now six or seven thousand girls at work in men's offices down-town, and while their entree into commercial life is always spoken of as a feminine revolution, the truth is that it has created a social stir deeper than either one sex has felt. When girls were first made use of on account of their quickness with their hands, the suitability of the work and the low price at which they could be got by reason of the large number seeking work, the craze was for pretty girls. Every man wanted a belle to sit at his desk and take down his letters and memoranda. It was natural. There were plenty of pretty girls, and who on earth does not prefer beauty to plainness? Men who are in my business naturally tried to get only pretty pupils and beautiful adepts. We scanned the girls' dresses, judged them by their stylishness, and insisted on general attractiveness. If we ever took up a plain girl we were apt to be sorry for it, for we had hard work to place her. Now all that is changed. I can show you scores of letters in which business men ask me not to send a pretty girl. In fact, the only offices where we can place a pretty girl are very large ones, where the employer chooses the girl and details her to go with others in some department or to assist a male chief clerk or private secretary. Those and the offices of the bachelor in business are the only places where we can get work for pretty girls.

"The reason is as plain as the nose on your face," he continued; "the wives have interfered. Every married man is visited at his office by his wife more or less frequently. If she finds him elbow to elbow or face to face with a pretty coquette every time she comes she is certain to make life more or less unpleasant for him. Some women in such cases "take it out" at home, as the saying goes, but I have men tell me that their wives were forever popping in on them and practically never missed a day without a call at their offices. These business men, nearly all men, pick up a bouquet or box of candy or some little knick-knack now and then to gladden the life of the girl at their elbow. Imagine the state of the wife who finds that the flowers she sees on her husband's desk were put there by him when he has told her ten thousand times that he has hated flowers from infancy! Oh, no, there is no show for the pretty girl in business in New York to-day. Those who got places long ago are being crowded out, and no new ones are now taken on."—Clara Belle.

Gossip of To-day.

A New England constable, who has had great experience with tramps, says that he has never yet seen one with a bald head.

The South African diamond fields last year yielded gems amounting to 3,646,899 carats and valued at over $20,000,000.

James Whitcomb Riley, the Indiana dialect poet, is said by a western newspaper to have made $20,000 during the past year by his pen and by lecturing.

George Kettle, a farmer living in Randolph county, W. Va., shot a large eagle a few days ago as it was soaring aloft with a half-grown lamb in its talons. It measured 8 feet from tip to tip of the wings.

The wealthiest man in the Northwest is James J. Hill, of St. Paul, President of the Manitoba Railroad. His fortune of $10,000,000 has nearly all been made during the past ten years in railroad speculations and real estate. Mr. Hill is 51 years old, and bids fair to double his wealth before departing this life.

Women's rights are evidently recognized in Lexington, Miss., where at least three ladies occupy positions almost always filled by men. Miss Emily Wright is the postmistress, Miss Cole is express agent and Miss Mollie Hoskins is in charge of the telegraph office at the depot.

Mme. Adam, perhaps the best known of the French women of letters, and the active editor of the Nouvelle Revue, is one of the best dressed and most distingue, as well as one of the brightest-minded women in Paris. Although a grandmother, she might be taken for a woman under 40. She lives at the end of the Boulevard Malesherbes, in a street named after herself.

The great French chemist, Chevreul, one of the scientific celebrities of the century, is living quietly in Paris near the Jardin des Plantes. He is 102 years old, and although white-haired and dim-eyed, he has suffered but little loss of intellectual vigor. To a correspondent who visited him recently he recalled many incidents of the Reign of Terror and the rise and fall of Napoleon.

John Bates, who is living at the age of 85 in Chicago, was Deputy Postmaster of the Lake City in 1832-3, under Andrew Jackson. Business was not heavy and Mr. Bates used to carry the mail in his pocket. In those days it required 25 cents to get a letter, and the reports made to the department of the business done were made in pounds, shillings and pence.

Anna Katharine Green, the author of the celebrated novel, "The Leavenworth Case," is living in a bright and comfortable home in Buffalo, where she is engaged in writing a new detective story. Her famous book has now reached a circulation of 200,000, and still finds a ready sale.

STARS AND STRIPES.

They Were the Original Coat of Arms of the Washingtons.

The Washington Star publishes the following letter from George Washington, an Englishman, now in Constantinople:

Under the title, "Origin of the Stars and Stripes"—your publication of January 7th—some allusions, only too flattering to myself, form part of Mr. Cox's letter. May I supplement that which he says by a few data which will interest Americans? Not only am I in the direct line of the English branch of George Washington's family, but I am the eldest son of the eldest branch. That direct line became condensed in the person of my grandfather, John Washington, rector of Oldham, in Hampshire, near Winchester. He had three sons—Henry, John and Adam. Henry died unmarried. John and Adam both married, the latter twice.

The sons of John the elder are myself, George Washington, the eldest; Henry Hofford Washington, commodore, H.B.M. navy, and Francis Palmer Washington, major in Royal Engineers. Adam Washington has four surviving sons, Adam, Robert, Marmaduke and Henry. We seven males represent the English branch of Washington's family in England in this generation. There are two non-males—she-males is not pretty—Florence Amy Washington, daughter of John and Fanny Washington, daughter of Adam of the same generation. So we are nine in all of this generation. There are any number of children and several Georges. My only son is George Washington, and if he marries his first-born son shall be called George Washington.

Here are some undesigned coincidences: George Washington the great was grandson of John Washington, Virginian. I am grandson of John Washington, English. General Washington died December 14th, 1799. My father was born on January 1st, 1800. General Washington was born on February 22nd, 1732. I was born rather more than one hundred years later, on July 25th, 1834—a good port year. Near Sunderland, in the county Durham, in England, is a village of Washington. There is also an ancient house in it with some "castle" pretensions, supposed to have been the chateau of the family, showing the quarterings, as I have been informed, of the stars and stripes. If, sir, you think it worth while to insert these addenda to Mr. Cox's letter, and deem the subject worth further discussion, and will let me know the same by favoring me with a copy of the journal containing my letter, I shall be glad to give you some further details upon which I can put my hand in England. Below I append the quarterings of my family. The bird is a raven, the motto is not, I believe, the right one. I shall inquire into this.

How to Buy Food.

Prof. V. C. Vaughan's paper on Food, read at the Ohio Sanitary Convention, contained valuable hints for the instruction of the family purveyor, from which the following is condensed:

BEEF.

A pale pink color indicates that the animal was diseased. A dark purple hue is evidence that the animal has died with blood in its body, or has suffered from some acute febrile affection. Good beef has but little odor, and is elastic to the touch. Meat that is wet and flabby should be discarded.

VEAL, LAMB AND PIG.

The flesh of young animals is more tender than that of the adult, but is less easily digested. The time required for the digestion of veal is five hours or more, while beef is digested from two and a half to three hours. The tissues of the young animal are less stimulating, less nutritious and more gelatinous than the tissues of the adult animal. On the other hand, an animal may be so old and poorly nourished that its flesh well-nigh defies both mastication and digestion.

POULTRY.

The flesh of no bird is in itself poisonous. The same is true of the eggs of all birds. The light meats of birds are more easily digested, less rich in nitrogen and in flavor, than the dark meats.

FISH.

Undoubtedly the flesh of some fish is poisonous. Fish should be discarded if the water in which it is boiled blackens silver. Fish caught from putrid water should not be eaten. The flesh of such fish is yellowish, soft, spongy and of foul odor. Fish should not be left in the water after they are dead, but should be packed in ice.

A Girl's Funny Freak.

Mary Ford, a Reading servant girl, loves all kinds of adventure. Recently during the absence of the family, she dressed herself up in her mistresses' best clothes and called on several strange ladies living only a short distance away. She introduced herself as the wife of the master of the house and invited the ladies to call on her, designating a time when she knew her mistress would be away. When they called she was dressed in her mistress' finest garments. She entertained the guests handsomely, showed them over the house and felt "so provoked" because the girl had gone out. This continued for some time and led to some queer complications before the truth was discovered.

Girls and Marriage.

"No girl under 20," says a wise woman, "has any business to think of marriage." Bless you, no. We know that. At that age no girl thinks of marriage as a "business." She just tumbles head over heels in love and marries the dear fellow just because she would cry her eyes out without him. It is when she is no longer what you would just exactly call a "girl," when she is rising 38 and has cut her last new teeth, full set, that she begins to make a "business" of it.

HON. THOS. WHITE.

Hon. Thos. White, Minister of the Interior, is dead. Cut down in the prime of life and in the very zenith of his success, friend and opponent throughout the length and breadth of Canada sincerely mourn, in the death of Mr. White, the loss of a true patriot, a distinguished statesman, and a brilliant journalist. He was the hardest worked man in Sir John McDonald's cabinet. His death is generally regarded as a great national loss, and the vacancy caused thereby will be a difficult one to fill. The dead statesman was immensely popular among all classes, and held a very warm place in the affections of the old chieftain, Sir John.

Mr. White was born in Montreal on the 7th of August, 1830. His father was Irish, a County Westmeath man, and his mother Scotch, having been born in Edinburg. After attending High School in Montreal, he turned his attention for some years to mercantile pursuits, when he accepted a position on the editorial staff of the Quebec Gazette. In 1853 he and his brother-in-law established the Peterborough Review, with which he was connected until 1860. He then studied law for four years in the office of Hon. Sidney Smith, Q.C., of Cobourg. From 1864 to 1870 he held a half interest in the Hamilton Spectator, when he and his brother, Mr. Richard White, purchased the Montreal Gazette, which is now the leading newspaper in Quebec province. On the 5th of August, 1885, he was called to Sir John McDonald's Government as Minister of the Interior. Died, April 22nd, 1888, aged 57 years.

SUPPORT HOME INDUSTRY.

We have often called the attention of the public to the importance of supporting home enterprise. THE ADVANCE has never given forth any uncertain sounds in this particular; and, what is more to the point, it has practiced what it preached. We have often pointed out the evil of diverting business from its natural channel, in so far as it related to every other industy save our own—that of printing. Yet, strange as it may appear, some of the very men most likely to be benefitted by this course, have—whilst energetically endorsing the wisdom of the position taken by THE ADVANCE—regularly patronized the tramp canvassers of certain "cut-throat" city printing offices, whose managers frequently retire across into the U.S., followed by the pathetic lamentations of duped creditors! Forgetting or ignoring the fact, that their local printing office turns out just as good work and at as reasonable prices as the same job can be done for in any honestly conducted city office, these selfish patriots spend their money outside the town to the detriment not merely of their local publisher but of the place generally. The same can be said of business men in Markdale, Dundalk and elsewhere—in each of which places there are well-appointed printing establishments.

This is manifestly unfair, unpatriotic and suicidal. The local publisher spends his money in his own town, his proportion of taxes help to keep the corporation wheels greased, and is the most powerful factor in advancing and promoting the best interests of the community. This last statement may appear to some to be boastful. And so it is; but it rests on a solid foundation.

Sometimes, when taxed with doing himself precisely what he condemns in others, your "selfish patriot" puts forward the flimsy excuse, that he doesn't like everything the local publisher puts in his paper! Profound logician! what would become of your own business, if your customers adopted your line of reasoning? Do not many—in some cases the most—of your patrons hold opinions diametrically opposed to yours in religion, temperance politics, and what not? If they treated you as generously (!) as you treat your home publisher, you might just as well take down your sign at once, put up the shutters, and go into the lecturing business. Subject: Patriotism; or "what fools these mortals be." You see, the "selfish patriot" is apt to forget the power there is in example in that many people naturally infer that if it pays him to deal elsewhere it will also pay them to do likewise.

We have in our mind's eye the case of an individual, for whom the people have created a monopoly. This person is rapidly accumulating wealth, nearly all of which has been gathered in from the community in which he resides. And yet it is a well known fact that he buys everything used in his establishment outside the place that has given him riches with a lavish hand! Although standing high up in the scale as a representative of his class, we know of no man, who is so small-souled, miserably mean and decidedly unpopular in his own neighborhood, as is the person we allude to. Take away his monopoly, and this miserable sinner's business would collapse like a punctured bladder!

We reiterate what we have stated time and again, that every dollar spent outside your own town is an injury to it. You are thereby building up other places at the expense of your own, and what is an injury to the community is, of course, an injury to yourself in common with others. Don't do it. Help to build up your own town and avance your own interests. Deal elsewhere and a precedent is established which will just as surely recoil on yourself as it will upon the community at large. Don't be a clam.

Your local printing office—whether it be the Herald, Standard, or THE ADVANCE—deserves your hearty support. Nothing paralyzes the efforts of the local press so much as this "selfish patriotism"—not that it exists to any very great extent, or that the home journals could not exist without such patronage. On the contrary, other enterprises are by far the greatest sufferers. Continue the practice and public confidence in home institutions will gradually but surely be withdrawn and diverted into other channels.

Again we say: stand solidly by home enterprise—first, last, and all the time. Talk up your own town; boom it for all it is worth—at home and abroad—and prosperity's sun will beam upon it and you. So mote it be.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Owen Sound.

From our own Correspondent.

A gloom is cast over our town by several deaths which have recently occurred in our midst. A few weeks ago was chronicled the death of Mrs. J. Bready, who had been suffering for some time for some time from lung trouble, and shortly afterward Mrs. S. Connel, afflicted with a similar disease, passed away. Last Thursday Mr. Border lost an infant child and on the same day Mrs. James Rutherford, in the 28th year of age, passed to her eternal rest. The Methodist church was draped in mourning last Sunday in memory of these departed members. Their husbands and families have the deep sympathy of the community.

Last Thursday evening a little boy employed in carrying parcels from Douglas' grocery store, failed to return home. No tidings was received of him, and the river was dragged, when his body was discovered. It is supposed to be a case of accidental drowning, but no one seems to know anything concerning the particulars.

Last Friday evening the fire bell was rung, but as it proved to be a chimney a-fire the excitement soon died out. Between 12 and 1 o'clock the fire-bell was again rung vociferously and the large grocery store of Mr. Geo. Meir and that of Mr. J. Notter were discovered to be ablaze. Wilcox's variety store was also burnt. The buildings were insured. It is supposed the fire was the work of an incendiary. In connection with his grocery store, Mr. Notter kept liquor, and some of the firemen took advantage of its presence by imbibing rather freely, thus unfitting them for their duties in extinguishing the fire. An investigation of the affair is being held to-day (Monday).

Mr. W. J. Bracken, of Brampton, has started in Owen Sound as Vet. Surgeon.

T. E. Vanstone, an estimable young citizen, has opened up a dry goods store on Poulett street.

Precious Promise.

Oh, what would this great world be,
Were it not to mortals given
The sweet heart-gladdening promise
Of rest and peace in heaven!

The ties of truest friendship
On earth are often riven;
Hear, bleeding heart, the promise
Of unity in heaven.

When tired of life's burdens,
And to despair we're driven,
How sweetly sounds the promise—
"No WEARINESS IN HEAVEN."

And when the hours seem darkest,
But to do God's will we've striven,
Oh, grand and glorious promise—
"A SURE REWARD IN HEAVEN."

Christian Pleasures.

How oft is heard the question,
Whether or not 'tis right
For Christians seeking pleasure,
Where worldlings find delight.

And many minds have given
Answer in many ways;
Still hearts with growing interest
Anew the question raise.

To young hearts overflowing
With innocence and glee,
'Tis hard in such a matter,
Wise counsellors to be.

What rule than this is safer,
Paul long age did give,
That to God's glory those who
His children are sh ould live.

It's not "what other Christians
Do or not do" should be
Our warrant, but "What sayeth
The Word of God to me?"

Each Christian should the question
At Jesus' feet decide,
And by the light that Scripture
Sheds on it to abide.

When he can pray, "Thy blessing
Now, Father, be on me,
That recreation sought for May to Thy glory be."

When he can say to Jesus,
"Come with me, Heavenly Friend,
For without Thee I would not
One hour in pleasure spend."

When he can pray, "O Blessed
Spirit be my guide,
Keep me from sin's defilement,
And in my heart abide."

Thus may the Christian pleasures
Seek, when he can so pray,
And none shall by example
Of him be led astray.

And when the Saviour's presence
Shall be with him, and where
He shall not grieve the Spirit,
His God shall bless him there.

Miss Anna Buchanan has been confined to the house through sickness for some time past. Her many friends will be pleased to learn that she is recovering.

On last Wednesday, 18th inst., the wedding spoken of came off at the residence of Thos. Kells, Esq., the parties most interested being Miss Josephine Kells and Mr. Henry Sparling. Rev. J. Walker Shilton, B. A., officiated. All wish the young people a prosperous voyage through life.

Mr. C. Gilbert, of Wiarton, was down on a visit.

Mr. J. Warling is fireman at the saw mill and business is booming.

An English Boy, who Asks for Fair Play.

To the Editor of The Advance.

Dear Sir,—I have not been long out in this country from England, but quite long enough to meet with a man whose meanness will yet bring him to grief. I need not mention names, for although the man I speak of treated me in a most scurvy manner, I do not wish to hold him up to public scorn—unmasked!

This man I engaged with as farm help last year. I was homeless and a wanderer and therefore only too glad to get a situation. But what a situation! Advantage was taken of my position to fleece me of a portion of my hard earnings. A certain article was palmed off on me as good, which, investigation proved, was almost worthless. Shirting bought for me in a Flesherton store at 17 cents per yard, was represented to me as costing twenty cents per yard! What sort of a soul must a man possess who will cheat a homeless boy three cents per yard on a little cheap shirting?

In other particulars this man's actions were quite on a par with the part he played in connection with the shirt transaction. To add insult to injury, this man spread certain reports throughout the country calculated to injure my character, and said reports were as false as were the statements he made to me concerning the cost of the shirting when he brought it home from the store.

All I ask, Mr. Editor, is fair play, and that, I think, will be accorded me in this great young country, where there is not such a marked distinction made between the various classes as there is in many other parts of the world.

Yours truly,
E. C. BUSH.

You Carry

A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."

Here is an instance of

who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:

"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."

John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."

T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

HAPPY BOB HANGED.

He Murdered His Sweetheart's Half-brother.

THE STORY OF THE CRIME.

A Salvation Army Enthusiast's Canadian Conquests and Fatal Jealousy.

A Warsaw, N.Y., despatch dated last Friday says: Robert Van Brunt was hanged this morning in the jail yard for the murder of Will Roy, at Castile, in October, 1886. The drop fell at 10.18 and death was painless.

Van Brunt was braver than most people expected, and was resigned to his fate. When a reporter saw him last evening Van Brunt was in good spirits and had not weakened at any time. After the jail was closed for the night Van Brunt ate a lunch and at 12.30 he smoked a cigar, took a bath, put on some clean clothing and talked cheerfully with the deputies. This morning Van Brunt entered his cell, knelt down in front of the crucifix, silently read his Bible and prayed, a whole hour being occupied in these devotions. He dressed himself and acted as he had at all other times, displaying a wonderful nerve. He ate a hearty breakfast at 8.30.

Eva Roy is here. She came early this morning, and at 7 o'clock entered the dwelling part of the jail and threw herself exhausted on a lounge. Sheriff Gordon was summoned and kindly told her she had best go to Gen. Thayer's house or to a hotel. "Oh, Sheriff, please let me see him!" pleaded Eva, with tears in her eyes, but the official was obdurate and Eva left.

THE MURDERER AND HIS VICTIM.

It was through jealousy of Eva Roy that Van Brunt murdered her half-brother, Will Roy, on whose lap he found her sitting late at night at the house of her father, where all the parties lived. There was no question about the act of shooting. It was simply that of a degree of crime.

"I shot to kill," he told a reporter just after he was arrested, and then this conversation occurred:

"Of course I'm sorry it is done," he said; "not that I cared for Will Roy, but it's his sister who is the greatest sufferer. We were to be married next week. I loved her dearly, and I killed Roy because I felt that he was making trouble between us. I was jealous when I shot him, and I shot to kill. I told Eva that I would die for her any time, and now I'm going to do it. I expect to hang for this, and I ain't going to worry and grow thin or cry over spilled milk."

Brunt, who was a prominent Salvation Army worker prior to the murder, told his story of the crime at the first trial. He accounted for the possession of the revolver by saying he carried it at night, and on the evening of the shooting he placed it in his hip pocket directly after supper. He had to go down street that night to his store. He described the visions of his mother, and said he was working until about 10 o'clock the night of the shooting. Will went into the front room, and while Bob was alone with Eva the latter agreed to marry him secretly. Will came back into the room and said he was going away. Bob said he kissed Eva good-night and went to bed about 11.30. It was the happiest night of his courtship. He slept for an hour, when he woke up and heard some one whispering downstairs. He listened at a stove-pipe hole, could not distinguish what was said and started downstairs, but made a noise and went back. The whispering continued and he went downstairs. Eva had on her night-robe and he thought Will had his arm around her shoulder. After he entered the room the whispering continued. Eva told him her mother let her get out of bed to talk with Will, but she did not want her to stay up with VanBrunt. Eva and Will got their heads close together, and VanBrunt said he was conscious of pulling the revolver and firing it, but he had previously had no intention of harming Will.

Van Brunt told a long story about having been one of the family of Lady Alderson, a sister-in-law of the Marquis of Salisbury, and how he had lived in royal state. Finally he fell from grace and was banished. Then he went to Toronto, where he had a grandmother. Several times he tried to commit suicide. There he joined the Salvation Army. Asked if there were any love episodes, he said there were both in Thorold and London, Ont. A picture of a pretty girl was offered in evidence. On it the prisoner had written, "My Darling Wife, Annie." It was Miss Annie Lepper, of Thorold, and the witness was engaged to marry her. A photograph album was offered in evidence. Among other pictures in it were those of Miss Minnie Granger, of Le Roy, a cousin of his in Toronto, and Miss Jennie Sable, of Warsaw. On the album was written:

THE CONQUESTS OF HAPPY BOB OF CANADA,
Castile, April 12, 1886.

The name and the age of some of my mashes while in the Salvation Army.

Yesterday Van Brunt wrote to Rev. A. J. Brockway that he forgave all his enemies, and died for a crime he had never premeditated. He had no fewer than three trials, and was sentenced to death each time.

FAMOUS CONTEMPT CASE.

John T. Hawke Found Guilty of Contempt of Court in Moncton, N.B.

A Moncton (N.B.) despatch says: In the Supreme Court of New Brunswick to-day the case against John T. Hawke, editor of the Moncton Transcript, for alleged contempt of Court, was ended, the Judges finding Mr. Hawke guilty. The contempt consisted in Mr. Hawke having asserted that a certain judge was in the habit of going on the Bench in a drunken condition. When the case opened yesterday, Attorney-General Blair appeared for the rule and Mr. Hawke showed cause in person why it should not be granted. Mr. Hawke addressed the Court for two hours and a half in his own behalf, and had not finished his argument when the Court rose for dinner. He contended, supported by a number of authorities, that the application for the rule was too late in point of time; secondly, that the publications were not, and were not intended to be, contempt of court, and that they were written in the interest of the judiciary, as well as the public; thirdly, that even if they were contempt, which he denies, it was impolitic for judges to intervene in such cases when party politics were involved. Mr. Hawke spoke nearly an hour after recess, and closed by presenting an affidavit defining his position. Mr. Blair followed for about half an hour, arguing that contempt had been committed. Mr. Hawke was formerly editor of the now defunct Hamilton Tribune.

HOWLING DERVISHES.

A Frenzied Baby of Three Years Takes Part in Their Ceremonies.

To-day we set out to witness some of the religious rites of the Refaee, or the howling dervish, says a Constantinople letter.

Around three sides of the low room were galleries, some closely latticed and occupied by Turkish women, others open and filled with curious spectators like ourselves. On the main floor were spread many rugs of Angora goatskin, on which were seated old men, regular patriarchs in appearance, while two groups of little children were ranged behind them. Seated close to the low railing were rows of men clothed in the flowing dervish mantle and tan-colored "galuph"—a tall, brimless felt hat, strongly resembling an inverted flower-pot, bound round the head by a long black scarf with ends left flowing. These ends were at intervals in the course of the service tenderly pressed to the lips. At other times the eyes were carefully wiped with these mourning badges.

Conspicuous before the high priest stood a lithe figure with a pale, cadaverous countenance, but a keen, penetrating eye, who was slowly manipulating a long, white scarf. He first threw it around his shoulders, thus symbolizing the all-embracing love of Allah; then, binding it tightly about his waist, he began tying and untying it, each knot having a particular significance. His whispered words will bear this interpretation: "I tie up greed; I untie charity. I tie up hate; I untie love. I tie up pride; I untie humility." And so on through a long list. Then began a monotonous chant that soon swelled to a tremendous howl. All rose to their feet and kept time with swaying body and jerking head in a frantic manner. The old and feeble among them gradually dropped out of the circle and took seats on rugs near the centre of the room, beside the rows of standing children. At length the eyes of the spectators became riveted upon the face and figure of a little 3-year-old baby, which stood for two long hours swaying its frail body in perfect unison with the dervishes and with its rosy cherub mouth uttering the same indescribably impressive cry of Allah! When the rude throng had at length worked themselves up to a state of religious frenzy, the little boy also rolled his bright eyes about as if beholding a heavenly vision. I can compare this worship to nothing I have ever witnessed, except it be the intense excitement exhibited at meetings among the "colored brethren" on a Southern plantation in the old "slave times" in our own country. One who has seen those impressionable people jumping, shouting and falling down with "the power" can imagine something of the harrowing spectacle before us to-day.

To my mind nothing was so impressive as the power of endurance shown by the infants on exhibition. I shudder when I think of the torture they must have been subjected to in the private drill necessary to prepare them for such a performance in public. Some of the children seemed free to pass out and in at will, but the tiny boy spoken of above and a little girl (a hunchback) never left their posts a minute, nor ceased to sway their bodies and shout until the performance was concluded, by a louder clapping and howling, more violent jerking of the head, and wilder tumult than before. Then a sudden hush, when, without a signal or look from any one, this lovely little baby demurely marched up to the high priest to receive his blessing, then laid him down, his face to the ground, before the venerable man. Another, who appeared to be a high chief of the Order, now took the stalwart priest by the hand while he placed both feet on the body of this frail infant and stood with his face turned upward, while he muttered what appeared to be a prayer. Then other children followed. First came the little hunchback, then three or four at a time, finally ten or twelve lay down, forming a human "corduroy road" for the high priest to walk over, until at least twenty children had thus received his blessing and had the evil spirit driven out of them. This ceremony is supposed to be a panacea, and there are always numbers of invalids brought to the Take during services to be cured of some real or imaginary ill. One aged man lay down to be walked upon to-day and one little boy, who was brought in by his devout and devoted father, refused utterly to be comforted in this manner, and was carried out most boisterously victorious.

Straw Hats in a Snow Storm.

A Niagara Falls despatch says: A party of about two hundred Mexicans are stopping here. Many of them are priests who are en route to Rome to visit the Pope, and one of the party informed your correspondent that they had $1,000,000 worth of presents with them for the Holy Father. The Mexicans, in their native dress, looked odd. Many of them wore linen trousers and coats and straw hats, and nearly all wore linen dusters. The ladies were togged out in dresses made of linen and other light material, and it was funny to see the party out sightseeing in a driving snow storm.

Bright Literary Prospects.

Friend (to young writer): "What do you hear from the Every Other Monthly Magazine, Charley, in regard to your MS?" Young writer: "It came back to me a day or two ago with 'many thanks of the editors for my kindness in giving them the privilege of seeing it.' Mind you, Gus, not the thanks of a single editor, but the thanks of every one of 'em on the magazine, and there may be a dozen, for all I know. I tell you, Gus, that was a great article, and I am going to send them something else in a few days."

The 10.30 train on Friday night ran into a team and rig at the "Grange crossing," about three miles from Lucknow, smashing the waggon to pieces and killing both horses, the whole outfit being worth about $400. The train backed up and a search was made, but the driver could not be found. There is a mystery about how the accident happened. The owner is one John McLeod, of Huron, and the supposition is that on account of the darkness the team got away from him by some means and he lost his way, as he turned up the next morning about six miles from the scene of the accident. He can give no account of how it happened.

THE APPLE PROSPECTS FOR 1888.

The Worst Enemy of the Trees and How to Combat its Ravages.

Mr. J. Tweedle, of Stoney Creek, writes: After the past five years or more of our experience in apple growing, which is now only viewed as most discouraging to the orchardist on account of the depredations of the many insect enemies, and also the fungoid disease, commonly known as the apple scab, which not only destroys the fruit, but has also a very injurious effect on the foliage, we have now some reason to expect better crops. The fine growth and rank, dark colored foliage indicate the departure of these destructive enemies, and it is hoped their absence may be a long one. The codlin moth remained with us and seemed more destructive than ever, almost destroying the crop in some localities. The mode of spraying with paris green for the successful combating of this pest has been so often described as to scarcely need further mention. However, care must be exercised in purchasing to get the pure article. One-fourth of a pound to forty gallons of water, kept well stirred while spraying, is the best and safest proportion of the mixture to apply. The best time to apply it is when the apples have grown to ½ inch in size and yet stand erect, which allows the paris green to enter the blossom end of the apple, which soon after turns downwards from increasing weight, shedding off the rains and allowing the poison to remain to destroy the succeeding broods of worms as they hatch from time to time during the summer. The tree should be well drenched from all sides to insure the reception of the poison into the blossom end of all the fruit. Some have made the mistake of spraying while in bloom, thus injuring or totally destroying the delicate organism of the blossom. The above mode of destroying the codlin moth has been so often tried and has proved so successful in its application, that it may be fully relied on as a safe remedy if properly done and at the right time. Mr. E. D. Smith, of Winona, informs me of his most successful treatment of a few old trees in sod, some of which yielded as high as 10 to 13 barrels of clean, sound fruit, and also of a yield of one bushel per tree of clean, sound, large fruit in a young orchard, while another orchard of ten acres set at the same time on his farm failed to give any good fruit—only small wormy apples not worth taking in. We neglected to spray our own orchard, and although it set a fair crop and the soil was thoroughly cultivated, yet the crop was almost totally destroyed, not five barrels of fruit fit to barrel where we should have had fifty. We don't intend to be found napping this season or any other, as long as we own an apple orchard. We would say, let apple growers take courage, prune, spray and cultivate, and expect an old time apple crop.

PHOTOGRAPHED IN TIGHTS.

Extraordinary Efforts of Girls to Show off Their Beauty of Form.

A New Haven, Conn., despatch says: A lively social sensation has developed through the police officials, implicating an official of the United States Signal Office, who is a prominent amateur photographer, in the use of his camera for the purpose of obtaining photographs of school girls in costumes usually worn by ballet dancers and burlesque actresses. The police allege that a short time ago two young school girls were invited by a Mr. Roland, an employee of a lottery and card scheme, to visit the company's rooms adjoining Signal Sergeant Sherman's office. The girls were shown a collection of pictures similar to those known as "cigarette pictures," and, after some urging, one of them exchanged her street costume for a suit of tights and, before she mistrusted anything wrong, the girl claims, the camera, which was in an adjoining room, was sprung, catching a very striking picture. The young lady was indignant and told her father, who called on Sergt. Sherman and after a stormy interview secured the negative. The other girl could not be induced to don the burlesque costumes. Roland admits that the picture was taken, but denied any allurement on his part. He states that the girls called on him, bringing a number of cigarette pictures and asked him (Roland) if he could not assist in having some similar ones taken. After some preliminary arrangements the girls were taken to another room and photographed. The police officials intimate that this line of business has been carried on quite extensively in this city and that the photographs have been distributed through the card companies. Sherman's story could not be obtained to-night.

Ferry on Boulanger.

A Paris cable says: M. Ferry in a speech at Epinal to-day denunciated General Boulanger as a mutinous soldier. He admitted that the Chamber of Deputies had abused its power in order to incite a ministerial crisis, but in defending the Senate, he said that the Boulanger crisis proved that direct suffrage was not infallible and showed the danger of a single Assembly and the necessity of a Senate. The existing situation was a plagiarism of the 2nd of December. He perfectly recognized again the hypocritical, equivocal and threatening formulas of that period. He would support the Floquet Cabinet, and he called upon it to assume an active militant attitude towards Boulangerism and to concentrate Republicans against the Plebiscitary Cæsarian movement. The return of France to Cæsarism would lead to a foreign war. France would lose the esteem of the rest of Europe if a second time in forty years she should be so foolish as to take mediocrity for genius—a Catiline for a Washington. All good citizens must rouse themselves to combat a reversion to Cæsarism, which had always left shameful blood-stained traces in the history of France.

A Trifle Too Much Affection.

NO MORE ROMANCE.

Explanation of Thunderbolts and the Aurora Borealis.

In the course of a lecture on electricity recently delivered in London Dr. Marcet spoke especially on thunderbolts. Most of them are meteorites; only a piece of sandstone broken off by the flash, and a third, carefully preserved in a museum, is a cannon ball "found at the bottom of a hole in a manure heap" struck by lightning had struck it a flash of peculiarly shaped pieces of iron pyrites, a coal and the clinker from a Kilburn engine have all figured in this capacity from being so carefully preserved by owners, are evidently cherished as relics quite as remarkable as they were their history less apocryphal. Fulgurites or vitrified tubes formed by the fusing of sand where a current of electricity in the shape of a flash has penetrated the ground also in the exhibition. But even affords little room for mystery. The ball is only a flash in another form. So is sheet lightning; while the remarkable tales of escapes from death by atmospheric electricity prove simply that the arrow is the current and how rapid the action. The blade of a saw has been severed and the handle burnt, while the sawyer remained uninjured. A lady had a bracelet struck off her hand while she felt no more than a shock; another had her bonnet entirely burnt on account the wire its frame was made of, while herself was untouched. Even objects only insulated from the ground are not for two seagulls flying over Witham were killed by lightning. All these difficulties have to be considered in erecting lightning rods, some of which are little better than traps to catch the electric fluid in the householder permits so impudent a means of protection to fall into hands of an ignorant mechanic. Has not generally associated with thunderbolts. But Dr. Marcet teaches the contrary and though he is not certain, in spite of Melloni's experiments, that all the phenomena attending a waterspout can be explained by electricity, M. Peltier affirms these upliftings up of water to be the result of electric attraction rather than of the action of the wind. But whatever conflict of opinion may be permissible on this point it is clear that none is permissible with regard to the aurora borealis australis. Science has deprived us of all the pleasant conceits anent the "merry dancers" of scarcely less pagan beliefs about the spirits fighting in the air or even of the winter sun being reflected from some vast glaziers at the back of the north wind. The aurora is due to the positive electricity from the sea between the tropics being carried into the upper atmospheric regions and thence wafted to the poles by the higher currents of air. Here, Dr. Marcet assures us, it descends towards the earth and meets the terrestrial negative electricity in a rarified atmosphere. "Luminous discharges now take place, their brightness being increased by the presence of masses of foreign particles in the air." And thus the electrician deprives us of the last fragment of romance which clung to the most picturesque of northern atmospheric phenomena.

PERILS OF THE TOILET.

Adventures of a Belle With a Slippery Redhot Slate Pencil.

A Philadelphia, Pa., despatch says: Pretty little Miss Helen Forster, a fascinating belle of the Twenty-third ward, won't wear her dresses cut decolette at the social gatherings of her set for a while, as she is obliged through a singular and painful, though not serious accident, to wear just now linen cloths spread with cold cream on her fair back and shoulders.

Miss Helen was in the midst of her toilet last evening, preparatory to making herself particularly attractive to expected company. She was engaged in the feminine occupation of enhancing her charms by curling into tiny ringlets the locks of blond hair that nature had placed on the nape of her neck.

To do this nicely she used—as they say thousands of other girls do, but may stop doing after they hear of the accident that befel Miss Helen—a long ordinary slate pencil, heated in the gas flame to such a degree that it almost singed her golden locks as she wrapped them around it.

At the very moment of performing this, to her, necessary function in her toilet, Miss Helen was only lightly clad. She had got along in a satisfactory manner with one bunch of stray locks and was proceeding in the frizzing process, when, horrible to relate, the red hot pencil slipped from her fingers down her back! It had gone into the opening between her single garment and her lily white skin. She screamed a cry of pain and uttered calls for help that would have alarmed the neighborhood if the windows had been raised, for the hot "frizzer" was frizzling her back into blisters.

She twisted and squirmed in the hope that the hot pencil would find its way to the floor, but it was stayed in its course and made her flesh quiver as it burned.

Her pitiful screams reached the ears of her parents and her father was the first to enter her boudoir. It frightened him to see the agony his Helen was in, and puzzled him, too. His first thought was, "It's a burglar," for Miss Helen was leaning hard against the closet door, pressing her back upon it with all her might.

"Is it a thief, Helen?"

"No! no! Oh! oh! Run and fetch mother!"

By the time "father" had returned with "mother," who had fainted dead away when she heard her Helen's yells, the pencil had cooled off considerably. Explanations were in order, and upon close examination it was found that Helen's fair back had been seared into rows of red, ugly looking blisters from her shoulders to her waist, although she had been gridironed, by the red hot frizzing pencil as it rolled down her back.

Poor Miss Helen suffered intense pain, till her back was smeared with a cooling ointment and covered with lint, but she was obliged to excuse herself just this once to her caller and pass that evening alone, registering a solemn vow never again to "friz" with a redhot slate pencil.

MME. DISS DEBAR.

Her Wonderful Claims and Lawyer Marsh's Marvellous Faith Therein.

Mme. Diss Debar and her wonderful control over Luther G. Marsh, a well-known metropolitan lawyer, are the talk of New York just ..

Mme. Diss Debar has occasionally come to the front in the big city for a number of years.

Her first appearance in New York, so far as the writer of this article knows, was in 1870, when, according to Ferdinand Seeger says, she appeared at the Hahnemann Hospital, where she claimed to be suffering from a hemorrhage. It was found that she only had a bleeding tooth, and she was discharged, though not till she had set fire to a mattrass, killed one or two of the doctors and performed sundry other curious feats.

Among the medical students she met at the Hahnemann Hospital was a young Frenchman named Massant. She was for a time an inmate of an insane asylum, and afterward married Massant.

Some four years ago Mme. Diss Debar, then a large and richly dressed woman, sporting an enormous diamond cluster at the fastening of her collar, appeared at the bar of the Jefferson Market Police Court and asked Justice Kilbreth for a warrant for Mrs. Flora G. Mayo, landlady of the Imperial Hotel, No. 3 East Fourteenth street. "I am Madame Diss Debar," she said, "and live in the house with this woman, and she is acting strangely. She has a boy, and I believe, she intends to kill him." The warrant was issued, and next morning the landlady was brought in and told this curious story:

"That woman came to my house in great poverty, and I fed and dressed her. Why, she has on a pair of my stockings right now. Her first husband, she said, was a nobleman, and their 9-year-old girl has a string of titles a yard long. Her second husband was an artist. In a little while she had such power over everything about the house that we all got afraid of her. Chairs and tables tipped over and moved about at her will. There were rappings all over the house. Lights appeared suddenly in the dark rooms and went out when any one moved toward them. One time she ordered a chinadish, and it flew across the room, struck the wall with such force as to dent it and fell to the floor without breaking."

These marvels scared the boarders away, and Mrs. Mayo proposed that Mrs. Diss Debar advertise as a clairvoyant, and a notice was put in the papers inviting people to call and consult the noted "Mme. Cagliostro from Prussia." The business paid fairly well, but the "gifted seeress" refused to divide. By this time, says Mrs. Mayo, she was so completely under the control of the strange woman that she could do nothing against "Cagliostro's" will. Then this mild, pleasant spoken and apparently sensible lady went on to testify to most astonishing things she had witnessed and begged to be released; so the court dissolved the connection and the gifted woman went her way. Her next appearance was to secure the arrest of a servant girl for mutilating a very valuable old painting. The picture proved to be actually worth $20. She had given Mrs. Mayo as security for board an oil painting which she said she selected from the gallery of her father, King Ludwig, and that it was worth $3,000. Mrs. Mayo succeeded in selling it for $30.

Upon his death she married her present husband, Diss Debar. She had two children by each of her two husbands.

The madame is very fat and claims to be the daughter of Lola Montez and King Ludwig. She also claims to be possessed of various supernatural gifts, and says she lived under a mountain in Thibet with the adepts for a long time.

Lawyer Luther G. Marsh, a member of the New York Park Board, believes her claims implicitly, and has given her his handsome house in Madison avenue, where she is now staying, with Diss Debar and Mr. Marsh. She has produced, "by the aid of spirits," a large number of paintings of people, both famous and common, and Mr. Marsh has them displayed all over his house. He is so completely convinced that her alleged powers are genuine that he recently asked the New York editors to go to his house and investigate. They sent reporters, to his grief, and Mme. Diss Debar's disgust, who actually treated the whole matter in a sceptical spirit. Besides the paintings the madame has furnished Mr. Marsh she has procured letters to him from divers great persons of other ages, all of whom tell him that the Diss Debar is no fraud and advise him to put implicit confidence in her.

Among the portraits shown the reporters at Lawyer Marsh's house is one of Demosthenes, looking as if he had been out all night with the boys; Socrates, with the hemlock agony on his face, and Aspasia, with an eye and mouth drawn as if Pericles had just got in late from the Areopagus and gone to bed with muddy boots on. Pythagorus looks sick. The large painting of Appius Claudius convinces the spectator that Virginia had a narrow escape indeed, but a fortunate one, when she was killed; and the portrait of Plato, done by Apellos at the special request of Mme. Diss Debar, is enough to make a reader of the Phaedo feel sick. And the infatuated lawyer, who is just as cute in a case as he ever was, swears that they were painted before his eyes by the spirits of great artists!

It now appears that Mme. Diss Debar was really born in Kentucky, and her maiden name was Ann O'Delia Salomon.

There will doubtless be more developments in the case.

A HOTEL ON WHEELS.

A Novel Engineering Feat Performed by the Aid of Six Locomotives.

Coney Island has had its crowds of visitors this year much earlier than usual. The attraction has been the moving of Brighton Beach Hotel in its entirety back from its rickety resting-place on the restless waves, some hundreds of feet, to solid foundations more to the north. This hotel has been one of the principal features of Coney Island during these later years of its world-wide renown. A mammoth structure at the outset, costing some $260,000, it was, during Mr. Breslin's five years of management, largely increased by the addition of the east wing. Towered and turreted, with graceful projections both in front and rear, and in length measuring some 400 feet, with an average depth of about 200 feet, its appearance was at once elegant and commanding. The beauty of the structure was enhanced by a fine frontage, extending some 400 feet toward the sea, and laid out and adorned with all the skill and all the resources at the command of the landscape gardener. For years past the encroachments of the ocean have been making sad havoc with the walks, the lawns and the flower spaces in front; and latterly, especially during the last two years, the ocean has been dashing wildly under the hotel itself a large part of which perilously rested upon piles. In the belief, at least in the hope, that the ocean encroachments at that point had reached their limit, the idea of moving the hotel bodily back in the direction of Sheepshead Bay began to be favorably entertained by the manager and directors of the Brighton Beach Company. The job was contracted for by B. C. Miller & Son, and as far back as October of last year Civil Engineer Farquhar was at work laying out the sites of twenty-four parallel railroad tracks, twenty feet apart. During the winter gangs of men were busy laying these tracks, elevating the hotel, fitting in on the tracks 120 new iron flat cars, each having a carrying capacity of 60,000 pounds, and latterly lowering the hotel, throughout its entire length and breadth, on to the cars. The tracks were laid so many feet in the direction in which the hotel was to be moved, provision being made for extending the lines to the requisite distance, as the rails were gradually uncovered in the rear. The next thing to be provided for was the application of force to accomplish the required movement. The weight of the hotel has been variously estimated at from 5,000,000 to 8,000,000 pounds. This, of course, necessitated great care, and also much nicety of calculation as to the resisting power of the track, and of the bed on which it lay. It was a necessity that this resisting power be the same in every track. To move so large a mass with anything like safety, especially considering its great length, it was an absolute necessity that the motive power be applied equally at all the points of contact with the hotel. This necessity was met by a most elaborate system of blocks and hawsers and chains and stays—the blocks, sixty in number, weighing from 130 to 350 pounds, the largest containing three loops of Manila rope especially made for the occasion, and weighing some three tons, being attached to the cars in one direction, and to the great fourteen-inch beams or stays in another direction, by powerful chains. From these stays, which were planted about 100 feet behind the hotel, the ropes passed to the engines. The actual force was to be supplied by two rows of engines on two separate tracks, three in a row, tandem style, each engine representing a carrying capacity of 700 tons. On Monday last the ropes were tested, and on Tuesday the work of moving the hotel was fairly begun. As early as 8.45 o'clock, few spectators being yet present, the signal was given, and the six engines, with full head of steam on, began to move. The cables, stretching out fan-like from the engines to all parts of the hotel, quickly tightened; the engines for an instant seemed unequal to the task; but it was only for an instant, as the mammoth structure was already in motion. The engines were almost immediately stopped, when it was found that the hotel had been moved some six or seven feet. It was a brief experiment, but it was a successful one, and the result was hailed with joyous approval. Careful examination showed that everything had worked well, and that the huge structure, in its brief but unparalleled journey had sustained no injury. A later attempt moved the hotel some 24 feet. A third advance was made toward noon, and 25 feet was accomplished. At about 3 o'clock, when vast multitudes of people had assembled from Brooklyn and New York, the supreme effort of the day was made. The excitement was tremendous as the vast structure was seen to move on and on. It was a sight which had never been seen before; and when the engines were brought to a stand-still it was found that the hotel had been moved 61½ feet further. At this stage some 117 feet had been traversed. The work was resumed on Wednesday, and was carried on with equal success, the movement being more rapid, even with the use of less power. In four separate movements, the last three being made by the aid of only four locomotives, the advance made was 124 feet. Some 375 feet have yet to be traversed; and then Brighton Beach, having resumed much of its former appearance, with its 595 feet of lawn, and lanes and flowers will, for a time at least, be able to laugh at and bid defiance to the merciless sea.—Harper's Weekly.

Still, They are Stubborn Things.

"Get out of the office. You make me sick! Bah!" And you would have thought it had been 2,000 years since Old Hyson had said about the same thing to his father, but it was not. It was only about 20 years ago. —From Burdette.

FERDINAND DE LESSEPS.

The Marvellous Man Who is Flying About the World at Eighty-Two.

A writer in the Epoch says: M. de Lesseps is about to visit the Isthmus again. The astonishing activity of this man of 82 is a never-ending theme for those who observe the career of the "grand Frenchman," as Gambetta called him. Whatever we Americans may think of the Panama Canal, we must admit that the promoter of the scheme is one of the most remarkable men of the age, and one of the most sympathetic. With Lamartine and Victor Hugo he is the most universally popular Frenchman of this century.

M. de Lesseps gets his wonderful activity from the paternal side, his father having been one of those sprightly Marseillais who never keep still a long while at a time. His mother was a Catalonian, and on her side he inherits his deliberative qualities. Most persons who have a general idea of M. de Lessep's career think he is an engineer, and ignore that he began life as a diplomatist. To be sure he quitted the diplomatic service in 1849, so the present generation may be excused for not remembering that before digging canals he was a promoter of peace on land. M. de Lesseps' father was also a diplomatist, and at the beginning of the century visited America for the purpose of negotiating a commercial treaty between France and our country.

To see this distinguished looking and alert gentleman on the boulevard, or galloping along on horseback, accompanied by seven or eight of his children, no one would ever suppose that he was in his 83rd year, and that he had had eleven children by his second wife, whom he married on the day the Suez Canal was inaugurated. A few weeks ago some of the numerous enemies of the Panama scheme started the report of M. de Lesseps' death. To a friend who called at the house to learn the truth of this rumor the celebrated Frenchman replied: "Some good souls have said that I was dead; you see I am still alive. Others have pretended that my leg is broken. If those who started this story will come and see me I will prove to them by a well known movement that my leg is in very good condition."

M. de Lesseps lives in the Avenue Montaigne in a spacious hotel that he bought three years ago from the Princess de Beauveau. On the day of his marriage, in 1869, his father-in-law gave him 100,000 francs to invest, not knowing himself where to place them for his daughter's benefit. At that moment the shares were worth 250 francs, and faith in the future of the canal was not very strong. M. de Lesseps put the 100,000 francs into Suez stock, and in 1885 they had produced 1,500,000 francs. With this money he bought the hotel for Mme. de Lesseps.

Waste Steam.

Two philosophers sat in a Brooklyn bridge car recently. Said one: "The waste of steam in a city like this is something inconceivable. If I had in dollars the earning power of all the steam that escapes and otherwise goes to waste in and around New York city every day I would soon be one of the richest men in the world. Why, from these cars windows you can see hundreds of pipes through which steam is constantly escaping, to say nothing of the boilers on the rivers and bay. The total number of steam boilers in the city is nearly 7,000. The volume of one pound of steam is about twenty-six cubic feet. A cubic inch of water makes about a cubic foot of dry steam. Only a small fraction of the latent heat of steam can be made available in performing work. About seven-tenths of the latent heat are lost through the existence of natural conditions over which man probably never expect to gain control. Two-tenths are lost through imperfections of mechanism, and about one-tenth is all that can be utilized, even in the best engines. So, you see, the daily waste is greater than the actual daily consumption."

The Evil of Chewing Cloves.

When I smell cloves on a man's breath my first thought is, "That man is a fool." He thinks he is concealing the smell of whiskey or some other vile smell, and he is only advertising it. There is another reason also why he is a fool. The oil of cloves, which is expressed from them by chewing them, is an active solvent of the enamel of the teeth. Any one who chews cloves will soon notice that it makes their teeth tender. That means that their enamel is disappearing, and the next step is a mouthful of decayed teeth, which all the odors of Araby the blest can never sweeten. When will people learn that the sweetest and rarest smell of all is no smell at all?

ONTARIO TO THE FRONT!

A Matter of Vital Importance.

The following unsolicited opinions from your friends and neighbors, men and women, whom you know and respect, ought to carry conviction to any doubtful mind. These words of gratitude are from those who have been afflicted, but are now well, and the persons giving them are naturally solicitous that others, troubled as were they, may know the means of cure. There is no reason why you should be longer ill from kidney, liver or stomach troubles. You can be cured as well as others. Do not longer delay treatment, but to-day obtain that which will restore you to permanent health and strength:

296 MacNab street North, HAMILTON, Can., Nov. 2, 1886.—I have been suffering for over twenty years from a pain in the back and one side of the head and indigestion. I could eat scarcely anything, and everything I ate disagreed with me. I was attended by physicians who examined me and stated that I had enlargement of the liver, and that it was impossible to cure me. They also stated that I was suffering from heart disease, inflammation of the bladder, kidney disease, bronchitis and catarrh, and that it was impossible for me to live. They attended me for three weeks without making any improvement in my condition. I commenced taking "Warner's Safe Cure" and "Warner's Safe Pills," acting strictly up to directions as to diet, and took thirty-six bottles, and have had the best of health ever since. My regular weight used to be 180 lbs. When I commenced "Warner's Safe Cure" I only weighed 140 lbs. I now weigh 210 lbs.

Mrs. S. Fuhrmann

ST. CATHARINES, Ont., Jan. 24th, 1887.—About six years ago I was a great sufferer from kidney disease, and was in misery all the while. I hardly had strength enough to walk straight and was ashamed to go on the street. The pains across my back were almost unbearable, and I was unable to find relief, even temporarily. I began the use of "Warner's Safe Cure," and inside of one week I found relief, and after taking eight bottles I was completely cured!

H. D. Emmerson

Manager for American Express Co.

TORONTO, 18 Division Street,) Sept. 17, 1887.—Three years ago last August my daughter was taken ill with Bright's disease of the kidneys. The best medical skill in the city was tasked to the utmost, but to no purpose. She was racked with convulsions for forty-eight hours. Our doctor did his best, and went away saying the case was hopeless. After she came out of the convulsions, she was very weak and all her hair fell out. The doctor had left us about a month when I concluded to try "Warner's Safe Cure," and after having taken six bottles, along with several bottles of "Warner's Safe Pills," I saw a decided change for the better in her condition. After taking twenty-five bottles there was a complete cure. My daughter has now a splendid head of hair and weighs more than she ever did before.

Mrs. Jos Emmons

CHATHAM, Ont., March 6, 1888.—In 1884 I was completely run down. I suffered most severe pains in my back and kidneys, so severe that at times I would almost be prostrated. A loss of ambition, a great desire to urinate, without the ability of doing so, coming from me as it were in drops. The urine was of a peculiar color and contained considerable foreign matter. I became satisfied that my kidneys were in a congested state and that I was running down rapidly. Finally I concluded to try "Warner's Safe Cure," and in forty-eight hours after I had taken the remedy I voided urine that was as black as ink, containing quantities of mucus, pus and gravel. I continued, and it was not many hours before my urine was of a natural straw color, although it contained considerable sediment. The pains in my kidneys subsided as I continued the use of the remedy, and it was but a short time before I was completely relieved. My urine was normal and I can truthfully say that I was cured.

J. Woods

GALT, Ont., Jan. 27, 1887.—For about five years previous to two years ago last October, I was troubled with kidney and liver trouble, and finally I was confined to my bed and suffered the most excruciating pain, and for two weeks' time I did not know whether I was dead or alive. My physicians said I had enlargement of the liver, though they gave me only temporary relief. Hearing of the wonderful cures of "Warner's Safe Cure" I began its use, and after I had taken two bottles I noticed a change for the better. The pains disappeared and my whole system seemed to feel the benefit of the remedy. I have continued taking "Warner's Safe Cure" and no other medicine since. I consider the remedy a great boon, and if I ever feel out of sorts "Warner's Safe Cure" fixes me all right. I weigh twenty pounds heavier now than ever before.

A Universal Language.

Unprejudiced people who have heard a mother talk confidently to her only baby do not see any need in this world for volapuk.

We accidentally overheard the following dialogue on the street yesterday.

Jones—Smith, why don't you stop that disgusting hawking and spitting?

Smith—How can I? You know I am a martyr to catarrh.

J.—Do as I did. I had the disease in its worst form but I am well now.

S.—What did you do for it?

J.—I used Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy It cured me and it will cure you.

S.—I've heard of it, and by Jove I'll try it.

J.—Do so. You'll find it at all the drug stores in town.

Too Solid for Show.

First Dame—How is your husband's business prospering? Second Dame—He doesn't like me to ask him questions about his affairs, but I know he's getting awfully rich. "Think so?" "Yes, indeed. He's got so now that he wear's one suit of clothes all the year 'round."—Detroit Free Press.

A Wedding Present

Of practical importance would be a bottle of the only sure-pop corn cure—Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor—which can be had at any drug store. A continuation of the honeymoon and the removal of corns both assured by its use. Beware of imitations.

The conference to settle the dispute between the United States and Morocco will meet in Madrid on May 1st.

Edwin Forrest's Secret.

The great tragedian, Forrest, had a secret which everybody ought to learn and profit by. Said he, "I owe all my success to the fact that everything I have undertaken I have done thoroughly. I never neglect trifles." That's the point—don't neglect trifles. Don't neglect that hacking cough, those night-sweats, that feeble and capricious appetite, and the other symptoms, trifling in themselves, but awful in their significance. They herald the approach of consumption. You are in danger, but you can be saved. Dr. Pierce's Medical Discovery will restore you to health and vigor, as it has thousands of others. For all scrofulous diseases, and consumption is one of them, it is a sovereign remedy.

That's the Question.

Albert (who attended the funeral of a lady with his mother)—Mam, was she drowned?

Mother—No, my dear. Why?

Albert—What did they give her that pretty anchor for, then?

Your Friend Committed Suicide.

You never suspected it, none of his friends dreamed of it, he did not know it himself, but it is exactly what he did, nevertheless. Do you remember his sallow complexion? Do you recollect how he used to complain of headaches and constipation? "I'm getting quite bilious," he said to you one day, "but I guess it'll pass off. I haven't done anything for it, because I don't believe in 'dosing.'" Soon after you heard of his death. It was very sudden, and every one was greatly surprised. If he had taken Dr Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets he would be alive and well to-day. Don't follow his example. The "Pellets" are easy to take, mild in their action, and always sure.

His Normal Condition.

Jonson—Tomson isn't in his right mind, is he?

Benson—Yes.

Jonson—Why, he's a crank.

Benson—Well, that's his right mind.

Montgomery, Ala., is supplied with the best of pure water by artesian wells.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Large bottles (100 doses) $1.00, or six bottles for $5.00.

There are thirty or forty vacant buildings in Thornbury, and the Union Standard says there are just as many in proportion to population in Meaford. In Flesherton there are not half a dozen, and most of them would be vacant under any circumstances. A steady wave of prosperity has set in here.

A red-haired Cedarville yahoo interviewed the Dundalk Herald's apprentice one day last week in the absence of Editor Spurr, and threatened to hurl the mighty engine of the law upon the whole establishment and squelch it out of existence. But Editor Spurr is made of the material that doesn't squelch worth a continental.

Last Saturday night about 7 o'clock, a young man whose business is not at present defined, but which when diagnosed might be classed with the bummers and loafers of the world's metropolis, was seen to stretch his big arms around some of the finest sticks of ye editor's wood pile and carry them off. About eleven o'clock the fire of this contemptible, sneaking, brazen-faced thief, we presume, got low, and as he thought the editor's pile was handy at any time, he went across the road to Mr. Hunter's woodpile and took therefrom a big armful, which, owing to the darkness of the night did not require a paper bag or an old copy of the Owen Sound Advertiser to shield it from inspection. As a certificate to be appended to this young gentleman's "swallowtail" we would say that as a cheeky, indolent, worthless vagabond you are near perfection; and, as a means of getting rid of you, may no more serious mode of annihilation happen you than the sudden bursting of some of those "eggs."—Dundalk Herald. Obituary.

Mrs. John Duncan, of Artemesia, departed this life last week. Deceased was a faithful wife and a devoted mother. She was one of the pioneer settlers of the Township. Her remains were interred in the Flesherton cemetery, where the last sad rites were performed in an impressive and solemn manner by Rev. A. Wilson. Deceased leaves behind her an aged husband and a large and respectable family to mourn her loss.

In England.

Mr. and Mrs. James Beecroft have arrived safely in England and are enjoying their visit to the old land very much. When within two days sail of their destination, Mr. B. wrote a very interesting letter to the Editor of the Patriarch, Rev. T. Watson, and despatched it by a Canadian bound vessel.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

Miss M. E. Smith, of Flesherton, has been spending a few weeks in this village—a grand place to rusticate.

Mrs. Bowerman, of Eugenia, who has been here for some months, is now under the care of Dr. McBride, of Heathcote. We believe her health is much better than it was at Christmas. Hope it may continue to improve.

Two sons of Mr. J. Carruthers—Thos. and Robert—have moved to Flesherton. These young men will be missed very much in our social circles as they have always taken an active part in church and temperance work. But what Kimberley has lost Flesherton has gained. We wish the boys success in their respective vocations.

Mr. J. Thurston's taffy party was a grand success. About fifty persons were present and spent a very pleasant evening together.

[Above came too late for last week's paper. A number of the items were too stale in consequence, and hence we have omitted them.—Ed.]

Eugenia.

From our own Correspondent.

On Friday morning Mr. Jas. Williams met with a severe and painful accident. As he was engaged in harnessing a horse the animal kicked, striking him in the face, laying bare the cheek bone and fracturing the eyebrow, but, fortunately, the eye was not injured. Dr. Carter, of Flesherton, dressed the wound. At last account the patient was doing well.

On Saturday a three year old son of Mr. F. T. Carr was playing with a marble and accidentally swallowed it. The marble stuck in the child's throat and the [illegible] before the [illegible] arrived.

Miss Bella Gordon, a Torontonian, is spending a few days visiting her sister, Mrs. Chas. Turner.

Owing to the impassable state of the roads, the Rev J. S. Corcoran, while returning from his appointment on Sunday had both shafts broken out of his buggy, and narrowly escaped a severe accident.

KATE.

[A number of items omitted on account of staleness through being left over from last week.—Ed.]

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

Stacks of Cottonades, Shirtings, Ginghams, Seersuckers, Cottons, Prints, Muslins.

Choice grades of Clover, Alsike, and Timothy Seeds.

That feeling of weariness, so often experienced in the spring, results from a sluggish condition of the blood which, being impure, does not quicken with the changing season. Ayer's Sarsaparilla, by vitalizing and cleansing the blood, strengthens and invigorates the system.

The Kiss in the Tunnel.

They were sitting five seats back, but I plainly heard the smack,
As we dashed into the tunnel near the town,
And the currents of my veins ran like gushing
April rains,
Though I'm grave and gray and wear a doctor's gown.

Once—alas! so long ago—on the rails I journeyed
so,
With a maiden in a jaunty jersey sacque,
And I kissed her with my eyes, as the timid stars
the skies,
But I longed, oh, how I longed! for one real smack!

Did she know it? I dare say! (She'd a sweet, clairvoyant way
In the glancing of her eyes so bright and blue)
Ne'er a bee such honey sips as the nectar on her lips;
But I longed, and longed in vain, as on we flew.
Just as yearning reached its height, lo! there came a sudden night,
And like steel to magnet clove my mouth to hers!

I shall never more forget how like drops of rain
they met,
In the bosom of a rose that lightly stirs!

When we came again to light, both our faces had burned white—
White as clouds that float in summer from the south.
Missed I glances, missed I smiles! but on air I rode for miles,
With the sweetness of love's dew upon my mouth.

So the kiss that some one stole, in that rayless
Stygian hole,
While with loud imprisoned clangor on we rushed,
Caused the sluggish streams of age with young madness leap and rage—
And my wife, restored to daylight, laughed and blushed.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"What are you puzzling your pretty head about, little woman? Is that communication a milliner's bill, and does she threaten legal proceedings?"

"It is much worse than a milliner's bill," said the pretty little wife, peeping round the urn to let her sweet dark eyes meet her husband's. "It is an invitation to dinner."

"From whom, Ruby? Not from Mrs. de Montgomery Tomkyns, I suppose?" Oswald Fairholme interrogated gayly.

"No," little Mrs. Fairholme said, with a long sigh and a rueful drawing down of the corners of her pretty mouth—"from Alice."

"Another! We must be in her good books, wife. She has invited us three times this season already, and last year asked us once, Ruby," Oswald remarked, with a laugh.

"Ah, but last year she thought I would allow her to patronize me!" said Ruby, with a little assumption of dignity which made her husband laugh still more heartily.

"And you refused to be patronized?"

"Of course; I was married more than two years before her, Oswald."

"But her husband is a 'real live lord'" replied Oswald, still laughing; "and yours occupies a subordinate position at the War Office."

"'A real live lord!'" repeated Ruby. "I think he wishes he was a—a—a navvy, or one of his own footmen. They at least can give notice and go, and he can't."

"You are very severe, little wife."

"I am always severe toward Alice," said Ruby. "I think it horrible for her to tyrannize over her husband as she does."

"Come, that is capital!" declared Oswald, addressing his remark to the breakfast-table, but not to the charming dark-eyed woman facing him and looking as bright as the sweet spring day itself in her coquettish morning dress and filmy lace cap. "And every one in London knows that there is no unfortunate fellow in it so henpecked as myself."

"Yes—you have that appearance," said Ruby merrily, as her eyes met his across the table with a look of perfect love and trust. "I suppose we must go, Oswald?"

"I will do whatever you wish, my dear," answered her husband, with an exaggeration of meekness.

"Don't be absurd, Oswald! Have you any engagement for Thursday next?"

"My dear girl, do you expect me to remember whether I have or not at this distance of time? Have you?"

"I am afraid not," Ruby said, sighing. "Besides, we refused last time."

"Can't Bertie have the croup?" suggested her husband, laughing at her resigned countenance.

"Oh, Oswald, how can you?" Ruby said in a tone of horror which aroused her husband's merriment as he rose to leave the breakfast-table.

"Oh, Ruby, how can you?" he mimicked gayly. "How can you credit your husband with such depravity? Let us go, by all means, love," he added, more gravely. "Her ladyship's dinners are terribly dreary feasts; but one must sacrifice one's self occasionally, you know, especially to one's relatives."

"Very well, dear," Ruby said resignedly, "we will go. I cannot think how it is that Alice's dinners are so stupid. There is just as much state and ceremony at the Glynn's, and yet Shirley's dinners are so charming."

"I think Shirley makes them as pleasant as she can, poor child," said Oswald, a sudden shadow falling on his pleasant face, "because she is so anxious not to let the world know the story of her married life."

"Poor Shirley!" sighed tender-hearted Ruby.

"Poor Shirley!" echoed her husband sadly. "What a spoilt life hers has been."

"And yet he is very good to her, Oswald," said Mrs. Fairholme, with a deprecating look in her soft dark eyes.

"Yes; but she cannot forget, Ruby; and he is not happy. How could he be?"

"She is very gentle with him, Oswald."

"She is as true and good a wife as if he had won her fairly," said Captain Fairholme. "But she cannot give him the love he wants."

"It seems so sad to me, Oswald," Ruby remarked, as she followed him to the window of their pretty breakfast-room and dipped her hand fondly through his arm, "that both their lives, and poor Major Stuart's as well, should have been spoiled. It would be much more according to my way of thinking if Shirley were to forgive her husband and fall in love with him, and Major Stuart should come back from his wanderings with a nice little wife of his own."

"It would certainly be a very satisfactory conclusion; but I am afraid it is a most unlikely one," said Oswald, looking down at her with a smile. "Shirley's eyes make me sad sometimes: they have such a sorrow in their depths. But speak of angels, Ruby," he added—"here she comes on Queenie!"

They stood at the window watching her as she cantered down the road; and Shirley, glancing up at the pretty house over which Ruby reigned so charmingly, smiled and nodded; and Oswald left the room to lift her from her horse.

"You are an early visitor," said Ruby, crossing the room to greet her as she came in, flushed and smiling from her ride.

"But not an unwelcome one, I hope?" Shirley questioned in her old sweet pathetic voice.

"Unwelcome!" Ruby repeated gayly. "I won't answer you, because you are only angling for a compliment."

"I came so early because I wanted to see Oswald," Lady Glynn said, smiling. "You need not be jealous, Ruby. I come here often enough during the time he is at the Horse Guards."

"And whenever you meet him out you monopolize his attention entirely," pouted Mrs. Fairholme merrily. "He never has eyes for any one else when Shirley is present."

"I really believe she is jealous, Oswald," his cousin said, lifting her eyebrows.

"Ruby a victim to the green-eyed monster!" replied Oswald, laughing. "The time of miracles is not past, you see."

"Tell me, Shirley," Mrs. Fairholme said eagerly, "have you had an invitation to dine at Eastwell House on the 26th?"

"Yes," answered Shirley, carelessly.

"And you are going?"

"Yes. We are disengaged, and Sir Hugh wished to go."

"Oh, I am so glad!" Ruby said cheerfully. "Alice's dinners are such ponderous affairs generally; but, if you are going—"

"Perhaps Oswald will take me into dinner," Shirley put in gayly.

"I am quite sure he won't," said Oswald's wife merrily, "because such a great lady as you will be conducted by Lord Eastwell himself."

"I am afraid I shall not enjoy my dinner the more for that," Lady Glynn remarked dryly.

"I can quite imagine Eastwell's heavy attention interfering with one's digestion," said Oswald carelessly. "Is your husband well, Shirley?"

"Sir Hugh is very well," Shirley answered, a slight shade of coldness coming into her voice as she spoke. "Have you any news from the court? Is Aunt Geraldine better?"

"She does not mention her health, so I presume she is," said Ruby. "Jeanie and Maud are springing up, you know. Jeanie is to come out next year."

"Is she really," Shirley interrogated negligently. "Ruby, is Bertie in? Can I see him?"

"Of course," Ruby said promptly. "Ah, Shirley, I don't believe it was Oswald at all you came to see, but the boy!"

"Shirley knows the way to the heart of the boy's mother," remarked Oswald, smiling half sadly next minute upon seeing how Bertie, a bonny dark-eyed boy of 2 years, sprung into Shirley's arms, and how closely and tenderly she held him.

The four years which had elapsed since [illegible] change in her; she looked as young and as girlish as when she had sat drooping over the school-room fire at Fairholme Court. She was still very beautiful, for what her beauty had lost in brilliance it had gained in tenderness, and the added quietness and languid pride of manner did not spoil its effect. It was no wonder, Captain Fairholme thought, as he watched her, that Lady Glynn was the belle of the circle in which she moved. She had made a sensation at court when she was presented, an eminent artist had painted her picture, and she awoke one morning to find herself a celebrity. Perhaps the very carelessness and indifference with which she ignored her triumph made it still greater. With scrupulous exactitude she fulfilled every duty required of her as Sir Hugh's wife, she dressed to perfection, she showed herself wherever he wished her to go, proud, serene and cold; she received his guests, she reigned over his household, she entertained his friends and sat at the head of his table with her own quiet nonchalant grace, which had such a singular charm. Had she loved him deeply, she could not have shown greater deference to his wishes, and yet open rebellion, passionate defiance, tears and sighs would have been less painful to Sir Hugh than this perfect indifference and unconcern.

During the entire space of time comprised in these four years, Sir Hugh had not known one really happy day. When Shirley recovered from the long illness which had prostrated her after the terrible strain she had endured, he had her taken abroad and treated her with a tenderness and consideration which even Shirley's sore and aching heart could not but appreciate. For a long time she was too weak and languid even to feel much; but, as she grew stronger, the sense of the wrong done her grew with her strength, and the keen and passionate resentment against her husband for his treachery deepened. Never for a moment did the icy coolness yet perfect gentleness of her manner toward him change. When they were alone, she never spoke to him unless he addressed her; he never won a smile from the still proud lips or a tender glance from the lustrous eyes. When he kissed her, there was no movement, no answering touch of the sweet lips; and it maddened him sometimes to see that, cold and unresponsive as she was to him, yet she could be sweet and gentle to others. Once or twice he had made a passionate appeal to her for forgiveness; but Shirley's large eyes had looked at him with a haughty questioning glance, as if she did not understand, and she had listened in silence, turning away without a word when his eager entreaties ceased. There were times when Sir Hugh writhed under his punishment, and when he felt that it was greater even than he deserved.

His wife's social triumphs were of course a source of pride to him, but they gave him little pleasure. That she should be beautiful and admired and feted was well—it added to his already great prestige in the world of fashion; but what pleasure could it give him when the beautiful face never softened and the sweet lips never smiled when they were turned to him? There were moments when the baronet felt that to meet her smile and see her eyes lose their cold indifference and soften into tenderness when they met his, he would have given his life.

They were tender enough just now as they rested on Bertie Fairholme, who had climbed on her lap and was playing with the little gold-headed riding-whip she carried, and the sweet lips were smiling as she talked to the boy in the sweet pathetic voice which had an odd thrill in it sometimes, and which had always been one of her greatest charms.

"Where are you going to-night, Shirley?" Ruby asked, as Lady Glynn rose to take leave, Bertie still clinging to her hand.

"To two or three places," she answered, with a touch of weariness on her face. "I shall try to get to the opera; but, in any case, my box is at your service, Ruby. They play 'Faust' to-night."

"Oh, then, I will go! I never tire of 'Faust,' you know, and I hope you will be there, Shirley."

"I will try to look in for the garden scene. Now, little man, let me go. Let him come and spend the afternoon with me soon, Ruby. What a lovely morning! Is it not?"

"Oswald," she said softly a few minutes later, as he helped her to mount and carefully arranged her habit, "I want to ask you—have you heard—do you know if it is true that—that" the rich color died out of her lips as she spoke—"Major Stuart has returned to England!"

Oswald's eyes met hers for a moment, and a great pity came over his handsome face.

"I have not heard so," he said gravely.

"They were talking of him at Lady Dulcie's last night," she said hurriedly. "They were saying how strange it was that a man with his wealth should choose to remain so long in exile. How is he so wealthy, Oswald?"

"Sir Jasper left him all his property, you know," Oswald answered gently.

"Sir Jasper was so wealthy, then?"

"Yes."

"But when—when did he die, Oswald?"

"Four years ago, dear—when you were so ill."

Oswald's voice was very grave and compassionate as he spoke, and his cousin's face was colorless as marble; but there was no trace of emotion there.

"Oswald"—earnestly—"do not look so grieved. If he has returned, I shall be glad—so glad to think that he has got over that bitter sorrow, and that he is happy. If he could only guess how happy it would make me to know that his long exile is over! I hope—yes, I hope he has come back."

She put her hand in Oswald's for a moment, and her lip quivered; then she rode away, her head bent a little, her eyes with a far-away look in them, which showed that her thoughts were not of the present. The groom behind her wondered why she went so slowly as they rode onward toward the park; but, as he followed, suiting his pace to hers, he was proud of the many glances of admiration which followed his mistress, and he felt as if some of Lady Glynn's celebrity were reflected upon himself. Just as they rode into the park a gentleman on foot on the pavement stopped suddenly and started, and looked long and earnestly at Shirley. Accustomed as the groom was to the admiration his mistress received, he was still somewhat [illegible] on this stranger's face, as his deep gray eyes dwelt long and lingeringly upon Shirley, as she rode on, unconscious of the scrutiny.

"Some hartist chap, I suppose," was the groom's mental comment. "Looks like it, with all that hair on his face. He's struck all on a heap with her ladyship; and no wonder, for she's a pretty creature, but too thin for my taste."

Meanwhile the "hartist chap" was slowly making his way toward Piccadilly, with a flood of bitter memories at his heart which made his lips close firmly under his heavy mustache.

"Well and happy!" he was saying to himself, thinking of what some great lady he had met the night before had said of Shirley Glynn, "well and happy, with that look in her eyes? My darling, if you had been my wife, it should not have been there!"

CHAPTER XXVII.

"That will do, Despree—you may go."

"Very well, miladi."

Lady Eastwell turned away from the mirror as her maid left the dressing-room in obedience to her dismissal, and stood for a minute or two in the centre of the luxurious apartment, with a little unpleasant smile upon her fair face. Alice was handsomer as a matron than she had been as a girl; she had filled out and acquired a stateliness of manner which suited her; and her taste in dress was unexceptionable. But the fairness of her face was seriously marred by an expression of discontent which was almost invariably present there, and the thin red lips had a satirical smile which was not pleasing.

On this evening, as she stood in all the splendor of her pink satin and Brussels lace, that look was very visible, and the unpleasant smile curled her lips. She was thinking of old times—of her girlhood and Shirley's at Fairholme Court, of Hugh Glynn and of Guy Stuart—and she was smiling to herself at the thought that they were all to meet that night under her roof.

The thought was not a kind one; but Lady Eastwell would have hesitated at nothing to humiliate her cousin. She hated Shirley far more deeply now than she had hated her in the past; then she was a poor dependent in her uncle's house, nowshe was a great lady, queening it in society by right of her beauty and wealth. It was true her rank was inferior to that which Alice's marriage with a peer had given her; but Sir Hugh's wealth was infinitely greater than Lord Eastwell's, and, while Alice's expenditure was limited, Shirley could scatter gold with both hands before Sir Hugh would utter a remonstrance.

And then she was so beautiful. A year before, when Alice had come to London a bride, she had felt a thrill of satisfaction at the thought that she, handsome and fresh as she was, would wrest Shirley's laurels from her grasp and depose the reigning queen. But she had been mistaken. Lady Eastwell was admired, but Shirley reigned supreme still. Alice's fair beauty, placid and impassive, and just a little insipid, had no chance against her cousin's expressive loveliness, her rare grace of manner, and her matchless charm. Lady Eastwell was undoubtedly handsome, but Lady Glynn was so wonderfully attractive that, had she been a plain woman, she would have been a leader of fashion from her fascination and grace.

There was not a little vindictiveness on her ladyship's face, as she took up the great pink fan which completed her dinner dress and swept down stairs to the glittering drawing-room, where Lord Eastwell, a slender little man, dreadfully afraid of his wife, was waiting for her. She knew how terribly distressed Shirley would be if the secret of her married life should ooze out, and she anticipated much from suddenly bringing her face to face with Major Stuart that evening. She might faint, perhaps, or be dreadfully agitated, and Major Stuart might betray his resentment against Sir Hugh. There might be a scene, which would be disagreeable, of course, but which would be infinitely painful to Shirley, who was so sensitive and proud; and Mrs. Majoribanks, who was to be one of the guests, was such a terrible chatterbox that— Ah, here was some one! And Lady Eastwell put on her sweetest smile as she went forward to meet her first arrivals.

The Fairholmes were a little late; and Ruby's dark eyes went straight to a tall bearded man, who was talking to Lord Eastwell, who looked dwarfed beside Major Stuart's stately proportions; and the deep gray eyes met Ruby's with a warm kindly light, although there was a little sadness in the smile.

"Major Stuart, I am very glad to see you," Ruby said, earnestly, as she put her hand in his, looking at him wistfully, her heart beating a little more quickly at the thought that Shirley would arrive in a minute or two; and Guy pressed the little fingers warmly, then turned to receive Oswald's cordial greeting.

"It is an unexpected pleasure for you, Oswald," said his sister, sailing across the room with a smile upon her face.

"Not quite," Oswald answered, in his pleasant voice. "I knew Stuart had returned to England."

"Indeed! Have you met before, then?"

"No."

"Then who told you?" Alice asked eagerly, lifting the pink feathers to her lips to hide their sudden quiver.

"I really don't know. I did not think that it was a secret."

"A secret! Of course not. Why should it be?" said Lady Eastwell petulantly. "You are so absurd, Oswald!"

"Did you want to surprise your brother, Lady Eastwell?" asked Guy in his kindly manner.

"I do not think I thought much about it, Major Stuart," she answered carelessly.

"Ah"—with a quick look at his face—"there they are at last—late, as usual! Shirley, I was afraid you were going to disappoint me."

"Are we late?" said Lady Glynn quietly. "I did not know it."

She turned to Ruby as she spoke, and her eyes fell upon Guy. For a moment her lip quivered; but she knew how eagerly Alice was watching her, and without any perceptible hesitation she held out her hand.

"I heard you had returned," she said, without a tremor in the rich soft voice, and then turned away to speak to Captain Fairholme. Sir Hugh, who had followed her into the room, had whitened to the lips at the sight [illegible] Shirley was an accomplished actress; but Sir Hugh was no master of the histrionic art, surely he would betray himself.

"I think you scarcely need an introduction," said Lady Eastwell, with her sweet society smile.

"No," Guy said, in the same kindly voice; "we are old friends."

He stretched out his hand; and his eyes, grave and earnest, met Sir Hugh's. The next minute their hands closed in a quick clasp, and the two men who had parted in such bitterness met, outwardly at least, in amity, and Lady Eastwell's scheme was entirely frustrated.

But Alice was too completely a woman of the world to show her disappointment. She sailed down-stairs in the wake of her guests, smiling and chatting to her cavalier. Major Stuart had taken Ruby, whose warm little heart was full of gratitude and kindness which she could hardly help giving vent to, and indeed her little hand pressed Guy's arm in her earnestness in a manner that was quite understood. Shirley was beside her host, listening quietly to his rather insipid remarks, while Sir Hugh, with an unfamiliar expression on his handsome face, was trying to rouse himself into something like attention to his hostess's civilities.

Glancing across the table at him, Guy saw that he was greatly changed since they had last met, that his face had a worn, dissatisfied look of unrest and pain; and Sir Jasper's words came back to him—"How can he be happy? How can he but suffer?"

It seemed almost like a dream to Guy Stuart to find himself sitting at the same table as Sir Hugh Glynn, with the touch of his betrayer's hand lingering in his, and Shirley's sweet familiar voice reaching him occasionally in the murmur of the conversation. Dinner was nearly over before he dared trust himself to glance at her. She looked as lovely as—nay, lovelier, than ever, he thought. But the look which had wounded him so deeply as he watched her ride by a few mornings before was on her face still. She was dressed in blue—a close-fitting, simply made dress of velvet, fitting tight to her throat, where it was finished with some yellow lace and a collar of diamond stars. Involuntarily Guy's thoughts went back to the last time he had seen her when she had followed him to the door of the library at Maxwell, clinging to him, with her wild eyes fixed upon his face and her shaking lips trying to frame words to entreat him to stay, while the masses of her dishevelled hair fell over her shoulders. Such a different Shirley she was now, so composed and stately and graceful, with such a quiet face, such a languid manner.

Suddenly, as he gazed, she lifted her eyes, and they met his for a brief moment; then the long lashes fell again, though not before Major Stuart met the swift look of gratitude and reverence which she had given him, and he felt strangely humiliated thereby when he remembered how earnestly a dying man had had to plead for the desired forgiveness.

When the ladies left the drawing-room, the conversation became general, and two or three times Guy found himself addressing Hugh in as quiet and matter-of-fact a manner as if they had not parted deadly foes, while in Sir Hugh's manner, when he answered, there was a certain conciliating eagerness which had something pathetic in it. It did not mean of course that Sir Hugh was afraid of any revenge the other might be inclined to take, but it showed that he felt how low he had fallen, and that he was grateful for the manner in which Guy had effected their reconciliation.

Meanwhile in the drawing-room Lady Eastwell was feeling thoroughly annoyed at the failure of the plan which she had cherished all through the week preceding her dinner-party, and she showed her annoyance by silence and a pettish tone of voice when she did condescend to speak. One or two of her guests left early, having other engagements, and Ruby mentally wished she had a like excuse; but there was nothing for it but to sit still and inwardly abuse her sister-in-law and sympathize with Shirley with all her warm little heart. Presently the gentlemen and two tall footmen with tea made a simultaneous appearance, and Alice brightened and devoted herself to Sir Hugh, rejoicing in the thought that he could not fail to contrast her charming amiability and animation with his wife's haughty indifference, while Major Stuart went across to Ruby, who gave him a bright welcoming smile.

"Fairholme tells me you are settled in London," he said, in his kindly voice.

"May I do myself the pleasure of calling upon you?"

"Oh, pray do! I shall be so pleased," she answered eagerly. "Yes, we have been in London for two years and more."

"And you like it?"

"Extremely. I do not think I should like to live anywhere else now. And you must see our boy. He is a fine little fellow—so like Oswald."

"You have a son? I did not know," he said smiling. "I have been living more like a savage than a civilized being during the last few years. I even managed to exist for months without a glimpse of the Times."

"You have travelled a great deal. Are you going to settle down now, Major Stuart?"

"I do not know. I am a restless mortal, as you are aware, Mrs. Fairholme. I suppose that that is due to my military career."

"You must have regretted leaving the army," said Ruby, a little incautiously; then her sweet face crimsoned when she recollected when he had done so, and she glanced at him in quick distress.

He met the look and smiled reassuringly.

"I regretted it a great deal at first—I missed my old friends; but at one time I had such a restless fit on that I could not have borne the restraint."

"You find many changes?" Ruby said gently.

"No," he replied smiling. "I felt so changed myself that I expected to find every one else equally so. Instead of that, I find you entirely unchanged, and Oswald, with the exception of being a little stouter, just the same as ever."

"And Shirley?" Ruby said involuntarily.

"She is not altered," he answered, letting his eyes wander to the beautiful face and rest there a moment; "or, if she is, it is so slightly that no one who had not known her very well in the past would see the change."

"She is as beautiful as ever."

"Quite. Hers is a lovely face."

Extraordinary Old Men.

Cardinal Manning yesterday, at the pro-Cathedral, Kensington, performed another of those astonishing tours de force which render it difficult for his flock to believe that he is really an older man than Mr. Gladstone. The Cardinal, attired in full pontificals—cope of cloth of gold and jewelled mitre—held in his left hand his gold crozier or episcopal staff during his long sermon, which lasted exactly 55 minutes. He held his congregation also, which was even more remarkable than the holding of his crozier. Another old man—Prince Bismarck—yesterday celebrated his 73rd birthday. It is not, however, until men get into the eighties that they are really old. Since the German Emperor died Cardinal Manning is almost the oldest of the illustrious elders of our time, and yet in sympathy, in intelligence, and in active interest in the affairs of this world he puts to shame the youngest among us.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Old-Fashioned Way.

"John," she said, as she toyed with one of his coat-buttons, "this is leap year, isn't it?" "Yes, Mamie," he answered, as he looked fondly down on the golden head that was pillowed on his manly bosom. "This is the year when the proposing is done by the young ladies." "Yes." "I hope you don't expect me to propose to you?" "Why, Mamie, dear, I never gave the matter a thought—I—er—to tell the truth, I've only known you for—that is to say—" "I'm glad you didn't expect me to propose. I'm not that kind, I hope. No, John, dearest, I couldn't be so imprudent. I am going to let you do the proposing yourself in the old-fashioned way. The old-fashioned way is good enough for me." And the gentle maiden gave her lover a beaming smile, and the youth rejoiced that he had found such a treasure of modesty.

What He Wanted

A Georgia man with a statistical turn of mind figures out that a man who regularly takes ten ordinary drinks of whiskey a day and keeps it up for twenty years will in that time consume at least thirty-six barrels of the stuff.

From a "Wish," by Matthew Arnold.

I ask not each kind soul to keep
  Tearless, when of my death he hears;
Let those who will, if any, weep!
  There are worse plagues on earth than tears.

I ask but that my death may find
  The freedom to my life denied;
Ask but the folly of mankind
  Then, then, at last, to quit my side.

Spare me the whispering, crowded room,
  The friends who come and gape and go;
The ceremonious air of gloom—
  All which makes death a hideous show!

Nor bring, to see me cease to live,
  Some doctor full of phrase and fame,
To shake his sapient head and give
  The ill he cannot cure a name.

Nor fetch to take the accustom'd toll
  Of the poor sinner bound for death,
His brother doctor of the soul
  To canvass with official breath.

The future and its viewless things—
  That undiscovered mystery
Which one who feels death's winnowing wings
  Must needs read clearer, sure than he!

Bring none of these; but let me be,
  While all around in silence lies,
Moved to the window near, and see
  Once more, before my dying eyes,

Bathed in the sacred dews of morn
  The wide aerial landscape spread—
The world which was ere I was born
  The world which lasts when I am dead;

Which never was the friend of one,
  Nor promised love it could not give,
But lit for all its generous sun,
  And lived itself, and made us live.

There let me gaze till I become
  In soul, with what I gaze on, wed!
To feel the universe my home;
  To have before my mind—instead

Of the sick room, the mortal strife,
  The turmoil for a little breath—
The pure eternal course of life,
  Nor human combatings with death;

Thus feeling, gazing, might I grow
  Composed, refreshed, ennobled, clear;
Then willing let my spirit go
  To work or wait elsewhere or here.

Little Ah Me and Little Ah There.

Little Ah Me was a Chinaman
  With a queue as long as his arm,
Whose spirits seemed constantly under a ban,
  Tho' he never did evil or harm;
But he ever inclined to the darker side
  And the pessimistic view,
And his life was a failure, and, when he died,
  The mourners were very few.

Little Ah There was another Chinee,
  But one of a different sort,
His face was a map of the Land of Glee.
  And worries he made his sport;
He had his failings, but he was gay,
  He'd many a little sin;
But he won all hearts by his cheery way,
  And they made him a mandarin!

From Little Ah Me and from Little Ah There
  The lesson sublime is learned,
That it's better to keep up a semblance fair,
  Till it's time to be mourned.
It's seldom a whiner may reach his goal,
  While a laugher seldom fails;
Strength breeds itself in a bantering soul,
  While the one that is hopeless quails.

My Little Bo Peep.

My little Bo Peep is fast asleep,
  And her head on my heart is lying,
I gently rock and the old hall clock
  Strikes a knell of the day that's dying
But what care I how the hours go by,
  Whether swiftly they go or creeping?
Not an hour could be but dear to me,
  When my babe on my arm is sleeping.

Her little bare feet with dimples sweet,
  From the folds of her gown are peeping,
And each wee toe, like a daisy in blow,
  I caress as she lies a-sleeping;
Her golden hair falls over the chair,
  It's tangled tresses carefully folding:
That my hands are so tightly holding.

Tick, tock, tick, tock; you may wait, old clock,
  It was foolish what I was saying;
Let your seconds stay, your minutes play,
  And bid your days go all a-Maying
O, Time! stand still—let me drink my fill
  Of content while my babe is sleeping;
As I smooth her hair, my life looks fair,
  And to-morrow—I may be weeping.

THE BOWSERS GO SHOPPING.

Mr. Bowser Creates a Sensation Among the Ordinary Run of Shoppers.

I had mentioned in a casual way that we needed some dishes, a new carpet and some table-linen, and that I must get down town and buy them, when Mr. Bowser came home at 2 o'clock one afternoon and said:

"Well, are you all ready?"

"For what?"

"Why, to go down and buy those things!"

"But I didn't know you wanted to go. Indeed, I wish you wouldn't."

"Oh, you do! Are you ashamed to be seen with me on the street?"

"You know I'm not. I'm afraid you—you—"

"Well, what?"

"You'll jaw folks and get into a quarrel."

"Mrs Bowser, are you getting soft in the head? Jaw folks! Get into a quarrel! Humph! Are you coming?"

We first visited the carpet store. I had not yet made up my mind whether to buy Brussels or velvet, nor whether to get light or dark colors. I expected to take a chair and have the clerk roll down about fifty pieces of each kind, and to be all of two hours making up my mind. One clerk ran to place chairs for us. A second arranged the window curtains and a third inquired of Mr. Bowser:

"Did you wish to look at some carpets?"

"Did I come up here to buy oysters?" demanded Mr Bowser.

"Ah-um! Light or dark colors?"

"Light."

"But the dark are all the style, you know."

"I don't know anything of the sort! There are plenty of white horses and houses and white shirts and hats; and I don't know why light carpets shouldn't be fashionable. Roll down this piece."

"Yes, sir; but you won't like it. This dark pattern is what Mrs. Governor Smith selected for her front bedroom."

"Yes. Well, I may get that for my horse barn later on. Send up a man to measure the room, and give me that light pattern."

"Why, Mr. Bowser!" I said. "You haven't selected already!"

"Certainly."

"But—we—we—"

"Five minutes is enough for any one to select a carpet, Mrs. Bowser. We want body-brussels, and we want a light ground. That's all there is to it. We will now go over and buy the table linen."

"But can't I have time to look around?"

"Time! What do you want of time? You want three linen tablecloths and two dozen napkins. We've got the money to pay for 'em. What more is desired?"

"But it's so sudden."

"So are earthquakes. We'll go in here."

We entered a dry goods store and sat down to a linen counter. A young man came forward to wait on us, and after being told what was wanted, he queried:

"So you want some real linen. Well, here is something I can recommend."

"Is that all linen?"

"Yes, sir."

"Is it?" asked Mr. Bowser, as he turned to me.

I didn't think it was, but I told Mr. Bowser to let it go. It was the custom in all dry goods stores to lie about such things, and no one thought of raising a row.

"Madame," said Mr. Bowser, as he took the cloth over to a motherly old lady, "is this all linen?"

"No, sir; it's half cotton!" she replied after an inspection.

"Where's the proprietor of this store?" he demanded of the clerk.

"I—I'll call him, sir."

The proprietor came up.

"Is that linen?" asked Mr. Bowser.

"It passes for linen, sir."

"If you put a cow's horns and tail on a horse he'd pass for a cow, wouldn't he? Sir, this looks to me like a petty swindle, and one you ought to be ashamed of!"

The proprietor began to blow up the clerk, and the clerk said he'd resign, and as we got out doors I penned Mr. Bowser in a doorstep, and said:

"I'll never, never dare enter this store again!"

"Don't want you to. The man is a liar and the clerk lied by his instructions. We'll try another."

The next store was crowded, and as we reached the linen counter it was to find every stool occupied. I tried to get Mr. Bowser out, anticipating trouble, but unfortunately at that moment one lady observed to another:

"Dear me, but this is the third afternoon I've come down town to buy a table-cloth, and I haven't got suited yet."

"And I want four crash towels, and I've been all over town twice," replied the other.

"Here, you!" snapped Mr. Bowser to the clerk, "are you busy?"

"Waiting on these ladies, sir."

"Have they bought anything?"

"No, sir."

"Are they going to?"

"I—I don't know."

"Well, I've no time to fool away. We want three linen table-cloths and two dozen napkins."

The ladies arose in great indignation. Each of them gave me a look that pierced me to the heart, and each one gave Mr. Bowser a look which ought to have shortened him two feet, but which had no apparent effect. In seven minutes we had found what we wanted, paid the bill and were ready to go. The clerk acted a bit sulky, and Mr. Bowser was getting ready to give him a blast, when I appealed to him to hold the peace. I told him it was the custom for several thousand ladies to come down town every afternoon to shop, and that shopping consisted of promenading up and down to show their suits off to a lot of well dressed loafers, and entering the stores and taking an hour and a-half to buy a sixpence worth of lace or ribbon. The clerk melted a little at the same moment, and I got Mr. Bowser out without another eruption.

"Now for the dishes," he said as we got out, and we went to a crockery store.

one who was saying to a clerk:

"And so that tooth-pick holder is six cents?"

"Only six, madam."

"How very cute!"

"Yes, it is."

"And it is imported?"

"It is."

"How very, very charming! This is the same one I saw yesterday, is it?"

"Oh, certainly."

"Dear me, but I wish I could make up my mind whether to take it or not. You see, we may move in the spring, and if we moved, you know——"

"I want about $15 worth of dishes," interrupted Mr Bowser.

"Yes, sir, in just a moment."

"How many of these tooth-pick holders have you got?"

"Only one."

"I'll take the lot; and now come and wait on me. I want twelve cups and saucers, twenty-four plates, three or four platters, two tureens and a fish platter."

The lady turned about and killed me dead with one long look. Then she looked at the back of Mr. Bowser's neck and tried to murder him, but he would not fall. Then she returned and killed me over again, gave her shoulders a twist and walked out of the store. She had hardly departed when a fresh arrival asked our clerk, busy though he was, to show her some tea-spoons.

"Madame," said Mr. Bowser, "do you wish to buy some spoons?"

"Perhaps."

"Do you know whether you do or not?"

"Why—I—I will look at them."

"Very well; you sit down and wait until I am through buying. I came to buy, know what I want, and shall pay cash down."

I was killed again, and if looks could have crushed Mr. Bowser, he'd have been a mangled corpse in ten seconds. We were only thirteen minutes buying the dishes, and, as we got out and reached the car, Mr. Bowser said:

"Mrs. Bowser, when you come down town do you go fooling around the stores and obstructing doorways and crosswalks like the women we have seen to-day?"

"I—I guess I do."

"And end by buying four cents' worth of something?"

"Yes; it is the custom."

"And would it have taken you three weeks to buy what we bought in two hours?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then I'll write this very day to an idiot asylum and see if I can squeeze you in? It's no wonder every other home in Detroit is full of scandal, and every other husband wants a divorce!"—Detroit Free Press.

A CELEBRATED Paris scientist, Dr. Delaunay, has made the remarkable discovery that centrifugal movements are characteristic of intelligence and higher development, while centripetal are a mark of incomplete evolution. In other words, the person who naturally draws a circle, for example, from left to right possesses a higher grade of intelligence than one who draws from right to left.

EAU DE COLOGNE DRINKING.

The Favorite Tipple With Fashionable English Women.

We hear from time to time of persons falling victims to Morphinomania, as the disease resulting from injecting morphia has been termed, and it is almost unnecessary to remind the reader of the fatal consequences ensuing to those who indulge in laudanum or chloral. But the very idea of drinking a perfume would seem to be almost too absurd to suggest. Yet, says the Temperance Record, medical men know only too well how many of their patients, more particularly among the weaker sex, take eau de cologne to excess, and to such an excess, too, as to compel, in some instances, their being relegated to retreats specially established for the treatment of dipsomaniacs. When it is known of what the odoriferous compound in question is distilled, it will be readily admitted that an incalculable danger may be the outcome of a continual use of it as a stimulant. The following is a receipt said to be adopted in the manufactories of the Farina family at Cologne: Twelve drops of the essential oils neroli, citron, bergamot, orange and rosemary; one drachm of Malabar cardamons and one gallon of rectified spirits. We have only to mention that spirits of wine, along with methylated spirits, are resorted to by habitual drunkards in the last stage of their complaint to make it appear self-evident that the strength of eau de cologne must be greater than that of the wines and spirits in common use, and its effect upon those who regularly imbibe it. What, then, it may be asked, brings about a craving for the fragrant preparation (we have used the word "craving," for a liking one can never attain for it, if we are to credit the confessions of an habitue which have come under our observation), and why is it that ladies form, as a rule, the largest number of its devotees? The reasons are not far to seek, and may be briefly summed up as follows: 1. It can be purchased with ease. 2. There is no occasion whatever to visit a public house, a call at a neighboring chemist's exciting no suspicion. 3. It can be indulged in with absolute secrecy, even as in instances we have known, where the drinker affects to be a staunch teetotaller. 4. Few people are aware that this article of toilet can be abused to such an extent as to bring about a condition of intoxication. Let us at once say that the habit generally commences by taking a few drops on a lump of sugar, in order to produce an unnatural buoyancy of spirits. This may go on for some time without any apparent deleterious effects, but in nine cases out of ten the old, old story results. The small quantity taken at first refuses to bring about the wished-for effect. Stronger doses are required to this end, and while one would well-nigh shudder at the idea of drinking half a tumbler of whiskey or brandy and water, the best part of a small wine glass of eau de cologne, filled up with water, is swallowed without the least compunction. Like many drugs it is exceedingly nauseous to take, besides being of an intensely fiery nature. Mixed with water, it turns into a repulsive milky-white fluid, and those who have been in the habit of drinking it assure us that they close the nostrils while doing so, eating immediately thereafter lozenges of a powerful odor to [illegible] drink three small bottles (costing a shilling each) or even more, per day. Pleasure in so doing there is none; while au contraire, those who affect wines, spirits or liquors do certainly derive some enjoyment. The only possible advantages eau de cologne possesses as against other common alcoholic beverages are—that it can be taken secretly, is in a highly concentrated form, can be carried about easily, and is rapid in its action. Many there are who are unable to break themselves of the habit of drinking the poison, except under restraint of the most stringent character; and we have it on the authority of one who has gone through this trying ordeal, that the first week after he is debarred from the use of the perfume, the suffering is intense. A fortnight, however, will in most cases see the worst over, and within a month the body will resume its natural functions; refreshing and undisturbed sleep will have returned, and the appetite will reassert itself, nervousness will "melt into thin air," and the feeling of despondency and abject misery will give way to comparative ease and comfort.—London Globe.

Singular Phenomenon in Mid-Atlantic.

The passengers who landed at Queenstown on Tuesday morning from the Inman steamer City of Chicago, from New York, report that on the morning of the 19th inst., two days after leaving New York, three immense spiral columns of what at first appeared to be waterspouts, moving in a southwesterly direction, were observed about a mile distant from the steamer on the port side rising out of the water. The sea at the base of the column was in a very disturbed state, and the spray was being lifted to a great height by a whirlwind. One column appeared to incline to a considerable angle. The phenomenon, which lasted for eight minutes, disappeared in a thick mist.—Pall Mall Gazette.

MAN AND HIS MANAGEMENT.

A Woman Who Knows the Subject Gives Advice.

If a man is fond of flattery let him have it. Not by the volume, but in crisp little verses. Hunt up poetry for his eyes; get things to rhyme with his fat white hands; pick out all the big gods and the little heroes of Troy and Rome, whose legs are not half as good and whose backs were cambric by comparison. Laud his shapely head to the skies, and he will keep his hair cut; praise his shapely hands, and you solve the problem of unkempt nails. Hunt the dictionary for words and synonyms to give variety to your enthusiasm; if he has ambitions or schemes listen to him with open eyes of wonderment, and no matter what the occasion is never permit your knowledge to exceed his. Men despise smart women, but have no fault to find when her talent is large enough to appreciate his greatness. Another piece of wisdom on the part of a wife is the cultivation of helplessness—she must be able to lift nothing heavier than a box of candy; know nothing about the management of an umbrella, a window, a knot or a bundle, and just in proportion as she appeals to his strength, size and greatness, just so large will her influence over him be. Men like to be looked up at, depended on, quoted and referred to. That's the reason why a little woman marries three times to the one wedding of the tall, heroic lady. To be born a woman is to be born a martyr, but the husband that is worth wedding is worth keeping, and if a little artifice, a pleasant smile, a contented heart, forbearance, neatness, devotion and tact will hold him, by all means let him be held. Men must be taken as they are, and not as they should be. They are not a half bad lot under the refining influence of mutual interest and love, and he is a very wretched specimen of humanity who cannot be counted on to shield a wife from the buffets of the world and be an anchor for her when youth and beauty have proved unfaithful. Poor fellow! he is weak, but he can't help it! He was made so. He would rather be good than bad, a king than a serf, and I think it is a woman's duty to do what she can for him. Sick and tired of the bang and clatter of the world's machinery, a man is ready and willing to go anywhere away from the tumult and with any one who will help him to forget his cares, disappointment and his very existence. This thing of trying to rule a husband is all buncombe; it can't be done. You can coax most men, bribe some and govern a very few, but that vulgar rubbing of the fur the right way wins every time.—Orleans Picayune.

She Got There.

"How funny some people are," she said.

"Funny?"

"Yes, some people who are going to be married."

"Oh!"

"Yes, some want to be married in a balloon, some on the middle arch of a bridge, some in a boat, some in a railroad train, some on horseback, some on the edge of a precipice, some down in a coal mine——"

"Yes, I have noticed it."

"What is their object, I wonder?"

"Marriage of course."

"Well, I'm glad you mention it, mine. They get married in this way so that they can tell their children and their grandchildren they were married under peculiar circumstances, as, for instance, 'your mother and me, children, were married in a coal mine,' or, 'your grandmother and me, children, were married in a balloon.'"

"Perhaps that is the reason," said the maiden.

"Of course it is the reason."

There was a pause. Then the maiden with a glowing cheek said,

"I've been thinking, John."

"Yes?" he said, interrogatively.

"I've been thinking how funny it would be—" (a pause and a deeper blush).

"Well, Bella, you have been thinking what?"

"I've been thinking how funny it would be if——"

"Yes."

"If when the subject of marriage comes up thirty or forty years hence you could point to me and say, 'Why, children, your grandmother proposed to me in leap year and we were married a few weeks later.'"

John is very busy these days furnishing a nice little cottage and Bella is superintending the making of her wedding dress.—Newark Journal

A Bombay Juggler.

Without paraphernalia of any description, devoid of dress, except a cloth around his loins, he peforms tricks of legerdemain the recital of which bring a shrug of unbelief from the reader, and will therefore not be attempted, and yet one example must be related just to give the imagination a chance. A common washbowl was placed in the centre of the room. Four hen eggs procured in the hotel were deposited in the bowl. The little assistant of the juggler, in the presence of spectators who could plainly see the eggs on the bottom, slowly filled the vessel with clean water. The Hindoo placed his bare hand on the rim of the bowl and the eggs disappeared from view, returning when the hand was removed. This was repeated several times, but he kept the explanation of the trick to himself.—Philadelphia Press.

The death is announced at Meran, in the Tyrol, of Baroness Jenny Schleinitz, at the age of 86. The deceased lady and her husband, the late Privy Councillor Baron Schleinitz, rendered a signal service to Prince William of Prussia, afterward Emperor of Germany, when, on the 19th of March, 1848, the revolutionary mob attacked the royal palace at Berlin. The Prince took refuge in the house of Baron and Baroness Schleinitz, who succeeded in smuggling him out of town in disguise. The late Emperor never forgot this episode in his career, and to the last showed his gratitude to the Baroness, who, after the death of her husband, some years ago, settled at Meran.—Pall Mall Gazette.

HOW TO MAKE SPIRIT PICTURES.

First Get an Ordinary Chrome, and with Practice the Rest is Easy.

Mme. Diss Debarr's spirit-painting is an ancient trick, which has been resorted to by mediums, astrologists and fortune-tellers in this city for many years, says the New York World. Any one who is familiar at all with art materials is aware that canvases for paintings are usually sold stretched over little wooden frames, which can afterward be inserted into gilded frames if desired. The canvases are made in certain sizes, so that it is easy to secure duplicates whenever desired, and any "spirit-painter" can promptly furnish an exact counterpart of any sized canvas that may be given to her to operate upon.

Like everything else in spiritualism, that which is done must be executed in the dark. A dim and uncertain light is necessary, and things are so arranged as to smack of the supernatural as much as possible.

"You have brought your own canvas, I see," remarked a medium as the visitor unwound a small modern frame over which canvas was stretched.

"Oh, yes; I thought I would be able to say that I had convinced myself that there could be no possibility of tricks."

"Very good," replies the medium. "The spirits and myself are well pleased to have the matter placed beyond the question of scoffers."

The medium is never discomfited. She has a canvas already painted just the size of the one brought, and a little clever work in the way of sleight-of-hand is all that is necessary. She takes your canvas, looks at it a moment, and then asks that it be marked. This is done. She carefully notes the position of the little mark placed on the canvas, and leaving the room she marks a painted canvas in a similar manner and places it under her skirt, through the side of which is a wide cut, large enough to allow the painted canvas to slip out easily. Returning to the room, the medium again takes your canvas and requests you to face a small mirror, which is so small that anything that happens below the level of her shoulders cannot be seen. While this placing is being done the medium apparently holds the canvas carelessly in her right hand, but in reality she hitches it to a hook cleverly concealed at her waist and draws out the painted canvas, which she raises in such a way that the painted portion is not reflected in the mirror because of a slight backward slant which is not noticeable to the visitor.

Meanwhile you stand with the canvas poised above your head before a glass and fondly imagine, if you are at all inclined to believe, that the canvas is the original one and that trickery is out of the question.

"Now," says the medium, "just hold the frame very steady for a moment, so as not to disturb the spirit artist, who is one of the old school and who will reproduce a most valuable ancient painting for you."

You hold the frame firmly and look steadily into the dimly-lighted mirror.

"Now," continues the medium sweetly, "tip it forward just the least bit." This tipping discloses the painting in such a way that it looks like a long, dark streak on the canvas. "Now tip it slowly forward, but be moved too fast and dispel the illusion too fast." The effect of this, in the dim light, is to make the painting, as seen in the mirror, to develop from the black streak first seen. To the subject the illusion appears perfect, and the cheap print chromo thus developed seems to the awed imagination a genuine work of art.

To make the trick even more impressive the medium sometimes places a touch of phosphorus in the centre of the canvas, which naturally attracts the attention and is watched with bated breath during the process of development.

Another system mediums have of producing these art treasures is a chemical process known to few. A picture is painted and then sized over with this peculiar chemical mixture. If an artist were to examine the canvas he would say that it had simply been primed. When it is desired to produce the spirit-painting the canvas is rubbed with a sponge dampened in a liquid which eats off the white priming and exposes the picture as fresh as when painted. This can be done on a wall as well as on canvas, and it is in this way that spirit paintings on walls are produced. Mme. Diss Debar "paints" most of her spirit-pictures in this manner. The secret of the chemical preparation used is carefully guarded by those who know it.

A Notable Cremation.

A singular incident occurred at Mildmay Park Wesleyan Chapel, London, on a recent Sunday. The minister, Rev. G. A. Bennett, B. A., has been denouncing the works of certain poets and novelists as having an immoral tendency. After the sermon, Mr. Bennett produced a large number of books, which he said had been sent to him to be destroyed by a person to whom they had been a great snare. Subsequently the books were committed to the flames by the minister and the chapel officials.

ROBT. GILRAY AND J. GORDON MOWAT.

Many of our readers will remember the above named gentlemen, both of whom made a sort of "starring" tour throughout East Grey during the Dominion election campaign, over a year ago. Gilray opposed Dr. Sproule, and at Shelburne and other places posed as a friend of the Scott Act. A few weeks ago the twin politicians and boon companions appeared suddenly in Dufferin county as champion spouters against the Scott Act, and here is what the Dufferin Advertiser—the organ of the Reform party in that county—has to say about them:

"The Anti-Scotts had a meeting in the town hall (Orangeville) on Wednesday night. J. Gordon Mowat and R. Gilray, of Toronto, were the speakers. The last named gentleman gave expression to the vilest rot ever spoken from a public platform in this town. He went so far as to plead for sympathy for dynamiters and lawbreakers, so long as the offence was committed in a Scott Act county. The hotel-keepers themselves were ashamed of him, and half the audience left while he was speaking. Mr. Mowat was a little better, but still pretty rank. He spoke for two hours and ten minutes and when he finished there were about forty of an audience left. Mr. A. A. Hughson rose to speak at twelve o'clock, and gave expression to more common sense in five minutes than Mowat and Gilray together were guilty of the whole evening. Mr. Hughson showed off to good advantage following such a pair of blatherskites."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

"The Chronicle as an advertising medium is unsupposed," says the Durham Chronicle. Yes, its considerably that way. It takes 'em often. Some people suppose the Chronicle to be a newspaper of the "unsupposed" sort, and they're right. Editor Mitchell himself has said so, and we have been credibly informed that he tells the truth ninety-nine times out of every ten thousand. Politically the Chronicle has rather an "unsupposed" reputation. In fact, taken altogether, its the most "unsupposed" newspaper we know of.

From the many absurd allusions made, we should judge that the Thornbury News has been afflicted with softening of the brain during the past two or three weeks. Ditto the Durham Scavenger beg pardon, the Chronicle we mean. We hope no ill effects will follow in either case.

A cricket club has been organized in Dundalk.

A library has been started in connection with Priceville public school.

The Free Press is opposed to shop licenses being granted in Shelburne.

The Standard suggests that Friday, May 4th, be set apart as arbor day for Markdale. A good idea.

Dundalk has a junior base ball club named the "Imperials." We suppose the president will be called "emperor" and the captain "crown prince."

George Moatz shot a pike in the Ballinafad lake, which weighed 12 lbs., says the Mt. Forest Representative.

Mr. Wm. Rutherford has disposed of his property at Proton Station for the round sum of $3,500, and intends moving to Oregon.

An esteemed old resident of Proton Station, in the person of Mrs. White, died on the 13th ult., and was buried in Flesherton cemetery Sunday following.

Shelburne merchants will close their business places at 6 p. m. every evening in each week, except Wednesday and Saturday evenings, from the 1st of May to the 15th September.

A middle-aged man, representing himself as at one time being sporting editor of the Mail, visited Dundalk recently and struck Bro. Spurr, of the Herald, for a loan. The latter had his weather eye open, however, and didn't bite.

Mr. McGowan is going on with the building of his roller mill at Durham, notwithstanding the quashing of the by-law alluded to last week. The people there will find in Mr. McGowan a pushing, enterprising and thoroughly honorable business man.

A child of Mr. John Duncan, whilst playing with a powder flask near the store on Thursday last, accidentally allowed the combustible to ignite and explode. The result was that the child's face and arms were very much blistered and in several places made raw with the explosion. Medical aid was at once procured and when efficiently attended to the suffering ceased. It is expected that the child will not be much disfigured.—Dundalk Herald.

What might have proved a serious accident occurred on the farm of Mr. Patrick Flannigan, 12th concession, Bentinck, a few days ago. There was a wood bee, at which many men were engaged, when a gust of wind blew down a sapling which had been partly cut. The men had a miraculous escape. Geo. Flannigan, who had one hand resting on a log, received a blow from a limb which severed one finger completely off and severely injuring the whole hand. The hand may be saved.—Hanover Post.

A number of desperadoes around Badgeros—a short distance from Dundalk—recently proceeded to eject a poor woman and her children from the house occupied by them. The inhuman scoundrels were masked and went about their infernal work after the shades of night had fallen. They were extremely violent and even threatened to burn the building over the poor creature's head if she did not vacate the premises at once. Down with such lawless terrorism! Let the black-hearted monsters get a taste of British justice, say we.

Wm. McKee, Luther, met with an untimely end in the early part of last week. He and two other young men were engaged in chopping in a bush belonging to Wm. McKee's father. When the tree being chopped was falling it struck on the limb of another one, and was thrown around in a different direction, one of the limbs striking McKee behind the ear, when running to get out of its way. The young man was 24 years of age and was a favorite among his neighbors and companions.—Mt. Forest Representative.

Away up in Singhampton they have a vigorous little boom, which although not so bulky as the Sudbury article is very exciting in its way. Coal oil has been discovered in the ministers well, and it is proposed to sink a shaft for oil. It does not follow that there is a vein of oil connecting with that well. We once found two ale bottles suspended by a string in a certain well not a thousand miles from a Scott Act town, yet we did not get excited and swear there was a vein of ale bottles running beneath the village. Not much; we kept perfectly cool and watched for more indications. As a result we became convinced that ale did not exist in that well in paying quantities. Let the people of Singhampton profit by our example and insert no expensive hole in the ground until they find plenty of indications.—Pickering News.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

THE "SPIRITUALIST" SENSATION.

A Mesmerist and Conjurer Exposes the Diss Debar Woman.

THE "OTHER WORLD" HEARD FROM.

Mr. Marsh, the Infatuated Wealthy Lawyer, Tells of His Experiences.

A special despatch from New York says: In the Diss Debar case to-day Carl Hertz, mesmerist and conjurer, was called. He testified that the production of spirit pictures was a trick and described how it was done. His offer to illustrate was accepted and his wife was given permission to help him. Hertz asked permission of the court to retire for a few moments to make preparations. An exhibition of the trick of writing on a blank sheet of paper on the inside of the fold while it was held up to the woman's forehead was given in court in the midst of much laughter.

Mr. Randolph was then given a chance to explain his history for the benefit of Lawyer Townsend. He had been a theatrical manager on the road. The story of his connection with the priestess and Mr. Marsh was then gone into. Some spicy developments came out of Randolph's description of his relations to the priestess. He said that she made love to him and told him how pretty he was. The reasons for his regard for the madame were of such a nature that he was unwilling to explain in open court. Gen. Diss Debar frowned and said: "Oh! You scoundrel!" Witness said the madame broke her contract with him.

Mr. Marsh was next called to the witness stand. His hair stood up in picturesque disorder. He sat easily in his chair and did not appear to notice the attention he attracted. Mr. Marsh said that he was a reformed lawyer. The general and the madame entered his home in August last. Mr. Marsh exhibited to the attorney a communication which he had received from St. Peter, sixteen pages in length, which he said was written by the spirit in two minutes. It took fifteen minutes to read it and was a fairly good sermon. St. Anthony of Padua was also heard from.

Mr. Marsh said he had various other tablets in his room which were locked with a Yale lock. Counsel for the prosecution asked Mr. Marsh if he still believed that the alleged communication from St. Peter came from that personage. Mr. Marsh replied that he did firmly believe that the letter came from Peter the Apostle. At this several presumable spiritualists in the audience applauded and the judge waxed indignant. Quiet was restored and the famous "Claudius" picture was then discussed. The Diss Debar woman told Mr. Marsh, in her capacity of medium, that a picture of Claudius the Roman Emperor would soon come from the vasty deep, and he said the picture arrived on time. One Mr. O'Sullivan once held a canvas over his head while an alleged painting of Rembrandt was materializing on it. Mr. O'Sullivan was incredulous and watched the operation in a mirror, but the picture materialized just the same. Here Mr. Marsh said he wanted it understood that when he mentioned his "communications" from the spirit land he meant that he received the communications through a "medium" and that "medium" was Madame Diss Debar. One evening Adelaide Neilson, through Mme. Diss Debar, told him that a portrait of Shakspeare would soon appear to him. A blank canvas was placed on an easel in Mme. Diss Debar's room. Then she went out and when she returned there was an excellent likeness of the "Bard of Avon." As Mr. Marsh warmed up to his subject and told how divers medallions "materialized" that same night the woman Diss Debar's face lighted up with smiles and she tried to glance admiringly at herself. Passing from the spirit painting industry to the communications, the witness told how the madame would go into a trance and he would act as her amanuensis. When the madame awoke from her trances she would almost die from fright when he read to her what she had "communicated." And so Mr. Marsh continued his remarkable tale, going into the details of the various paintings and "communications" in a manner which conclusively proved his unshaken belief in the supernatural character of Madame Diss Debar's performances.

Carl Hertz, the magician, was recalled to the stand to prove to Mr. Marsh that an ordinary earthly conjurer could do the trick of writing on a closed pad of paper. At this stage the Diss Debar woman began to evince an active interest in the proceedings. "Mark your pad, Mr. Marsh," she fairly hissed at her victim, only to provoke a cry of "silence" from the judge. The conjurer produced a new pad which Mr. Marsh carefully examined, and apparently tossed it into a newspaper and folded it up. As a matter of fact he had changed pads, but Mr. Marsh did not see the change and but for the warning of Mrs. Diss Debar's counsel the trick would have hoodwinked him. The judge told the overzealous lawyer that he had exceeded his duty and with this remark adjourned the hearing until next Tuesday.

Counsel for the Lawrences asked that they be paroled on their own recognizance, and father and son were thereupon released on these terms. The Diss Debars were securely locked up in the tombs prison, where they will remain until the next hearing. After the hearing to-day somebody in a position to know suggested that Agent "Randolph" was really a detective employed by Pinkerton. Whether the assertion was true or not did not appear, but it is nevertheless generally believed.

John Bright always dresses in black broadcloth, and doesn't wear the Quaker costume, although he always attends the church meetings and sometimes preaches.

Mr. C. P. Preston, of Esquesing, has been dangerously ill for the last two weeks with rheumatic fever.

Young man, never preserve a love-letter. The sweets keep slowly ebbing out of it till it gets to be as stale as a fourteenth-century witticism; and then like as not your wife will get hold of it, and go and take all of the Paris green you were saving for the potato bugs.—Burlington Free Press.

WHERE ARNOLD LIES.

The Burial at Laleham Church—Some of the Distinguished Men Who Were Present.

A London cable says: Matthew Arnold was buried on Thursday afternoon at Laleham Church, two miles from Staines, on the Thames. Large numbers of friends went down from London by train, arriving at Staines just before noon, and thence driving to Laleham. Among them were Mr. Browning, Lord Chief Justice Coleridge; the Master of Balliol, Dr. Jowett; the historian, Mr. Lecky; Mr. Henry James, the American; Mr. Mundella, Mr. Leonard Courtney, Admiral Egerton, Sir George Russel, Mr. and Mrs. Humphry Ward, Mr. Lyulph Stanley and Sir Edwin Arnold. Mr. Frederick Macmillan represented one firm of Mr. Arnold's publishers, and Mr. Arnold's staunch friend, Mr. Geo. Smith, with his son, the other—the firm of Smith, Elder & Co., who issued nearly all his prose works. Many others came, but there was no representative of either the Government or the Court.

Laleham Church is a very small and seemingly a very ancient building of extreme simplicity, with a picturesque red brick, ivy-covered, square tower. Here lie three of Mr. Arnold's children in the narrow churchyard. Houses crowd close up to it, and the place is quiet but not solitary. The hearse and carriages following with the family arrived just after 12. The Dean of Westminster and Archdeacon Farrar went out from the church to meet the body, which lay in a plain oak coffin embosomed in flowers. It entered the low porch with friends on either hand. The church was filled and the service was said, the coffin resting near the entrance. The service at the grave was read by the Dean of Westminster amid heavily falling rain, and with two or three hundred mourners about the grave. Very solemn was this sorrowing company, and singularly impressive the scene in its perfect simplicity and perfect sincerity. All was over before 1, and the last "good-bye" said to the great writer and beloved friend.

PRAYER CURE RESULTS FATALLY.

When the Victims are Dying the Services of a Physician Sought.

A West Medford, Mass., despatch says: The prayer cure has been tried in West Medford with fatal results, two lives being sacrificed to a superstition that seems criminal. On Sharon street Mrs. Lottie A. James, her husband and four children lived in one half of the house. The other part is occupied by her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Connor. The lady, who is about 55 years old, is a graduate of a Christian scientist college, a woman of more than average intelligence and of most exemplary piety. She is a thorough believer in the doctrine that all disease can be cured by prayer and faith.

On Thursday night, when her daughter, Mrs. James, was in the throes of childbirth she had recourse to prayer alone, although Mrs. James begged her mother piteously to send for a physician. At last Mrs. Connor relented, but before the physician was ready to answer the call another messenger came, saying that his services were not needed, as Mrs. James was dead.

Mrs. Connor attributes her daughter's melancholy death to an inscrutable decree of Providence, and consoles herself with the thought that "He doeth all things well."

Holding a diploma from a regularly organized prayer cure institution Mrs. Connor thought herself qualified to sign the certificate of death. She was soon disabused of her error by Medical Examiner Duxell.

$30,000 FOR AN AGED BROKEN HEART

A Widow of 60 Sues a Widower of 70 for Breach of Promise.

A Medina (N.Y.) telegram says: A sensation has been created here and in Albion by the commencement at Albion of a breach of promise suit. The damages asked for are $30,000. The plaintiff is Mrs. Moses Ross, a widow 60 years old, who lives at Medina. The defendant is Washington Ferguson, of Albion, a widower, aged over 70. He is very wealthy and widely known. Mrs. Ross, in her complaint, says that Mr. Ferguson had engaged to marry her, and that while she was getting ready for the ceremony he suddenly married Mrs. H. Wirt, of Eagle Harbor, a widow of more pretensions to youthful years.

Handsome Africans.

The Bangalas, says a writer in "Blackwood's Magazine," are a fine race physically, being tall, powerful and splendidly formed, with features by no means of the negro type; the women are the handsomest I have seen in Africa. Their dress is scanty, consisting for the most part only of a waist cloth for the men, and a short kilt of woven grass for the women; but men of high degree often wear mantles of dressed goat or other skins. They cicatrize their arms, shoulders and busts in patterns by cutting the skin and injecting some irritant. Sometimes the result looks very well; but in other cases the process is not successful, and raises huge unsightly lumps of flesh. The chief of Iboko, when I arrived, was an old man over 80—his age was reported by some to be 84, by others, 86—who had lost one eye in battle and possessed fifty wives. He was over six feet in height, with a fine, well-developed figure, and, but for his dirty white hair and shrivelled skin, would have passed for a man of half his age. He was much attached to Captain Coquilhat (named "Mwafa" or the "Eagle" by the natives), and never undertook anything without consulting him. The scene just after our arrival at Bangala, when, "Le Roi des Bangalas" being announced as we were all sitting over our afternoon coffee, Mata Bwyki entered, wearing his royal hat of leopard skin and attended by several of his wives, and enfolded Captain Coquilhat, gold-spangled uniform and all, in an ample bear's hug, was really worth seeing.

Beginning to be Concerned.

"Doesn't it embarrass you to be kissed by your husband before a car full of people?'

"Embarrass me?" replied the lady, who was starting off on a journey, as she settled herself comfortably in her seat and looked at the questioner. "Did John kiss me when he said good-bye? I declare I didn't notice it. Is my hat on straight, Laura?"

DOMINION PARLIAMENT

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:

Respecting the Central Ontario Railway Company—Mr. Wood (Brockville).

To provide for the examination and licensing of persons employed as engineers elsewhere than on steamboats—Mr. Cook.

To prevent the practice of fraud by tree peddlers and commission men in the sale of nursery stock—Mr. Boyle.

Mr. Thompson introduced a Bill to amend the Territories Real Property Act.

Mr. McLelan, in answer to the inquiry of Mr. Charlton, said it had been reported to him that the Deputy-Postmaster of Kingston had been detected in having treated letters improperly, and it was reported to him at the same time that the official had left the country. He had given orders since, learning of his return, that he should be proceeded against.

Mr. Thompson, in answer to Sir Richard Cartwright, said it was not the intention of the Government to propose any addition to the salaries of County Judges of the Province of Ontario.

Sir John Macdonald, replying to the question of Mr. Landerkin, said it was not the intention of the Government during the present session to remove the duties on books imported for use of Mechanics' Institutes.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the second reading of the Bill to permit American vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters.

Sir Charles Tupper said the Government had carefully considered this Bill, and though there was much in it that was desirable, they were afraid that its passage might prejudice a much larger measure of reciprocity which might at no distant date be secured. It was well known that the Americans are desirous that this Bill should become law.

Mr. Laurier said he thought if there was any prospect of securing an enlarged measure of reciprocity by postponing the Bill, it would be well to do so. It was evident that reciprocity was in the air. But recently the Government had put seeds and fruit on the free list as part of a reciprocal arrangement with the United States.

Sir Charles Tupper—We are sowing the seed.

Mr. Laurier—And we shall reap the harvest by-and-bye.

Mr. Kirkpatrick said he did not agree with the reason given by the Finance Minister for withholding the advantages of reciprocity in wrecking from the Canadians. He believed that the adoption of the Bill would act as an inducement to the Americans to make further proposals to us in the same direction.

Mr. Patterson (Essex) said the course proposed by the Finance Minister was a wise and statesmanlike one. He did not believe in giving to the neighboring nation the privilege they wanted and receiving in return something that was of very little value.

The House divided on the second reading, which was lost. Yeas 61, nays 85:

Sir Richard Cartwright announced that to-morrow he would call the attention of the House to the conduct of the returning officer for the county of Haldimand.

Sir Hector Langevin moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. Jamieson said he would much prefer that the House would take up the next order on the paper, which was the Bill to amend the Canada Temperance Act, instead of adjourning at that early hour. On the last occasion the Bill was reached he allowed it to stand over on the suggestion of a member of the Government that it should be taken up to-night. (Laughter.) He did not want to have the matter stand over any longer

Sir Hector Langevin said the House had been sitting late, and as there would be lengthy sittings during the two following days, it would meet the views of the majority of members to adjourn. Ample opportunity would be given to consider the Bill.

Mr. Fisher regretted that the Government had taken upon themselves to prevent the consideration of this Bill. If the Government prejudiced the case they must take upon themselves the responsibility of blocking the amendment to the Scott Act.

Sir Charles Tupper said the Government would take care there would be full opportunity to bring the Bill before the House.

Mr. Thompson introduced a Bill to amend the Indian Act. He explained that the Bill made more stringent provision for the admission of half-breeds to treaty privileges, and for their retirement from the treaty. It was also proposed to make Indian lands amenable to the remedies for municipal taxation, and to be sold and conveyed by tax deeds. More stringent provision was also made with reference to the sale of liquor to the Indians, and authority was given in British Columbia to the Governor-in-Council to appropriate the proceeds of fines for the sale of liquor to Indians.

Sir Richard Cartwright called the attention of the House to the question he put to the Government a few days previously. He had asked if the Government were aware that Charles Young, one of the deputy returning-officers for Haldimand, in February and November, 1887, had served a term of imprisonment for theft in Brant jail previous to being appointed deputy returning-officer. The Minister of Justice had answered that the deputy returning-officer, Young, was not an officer of the Government, and that they were informed he had not served such term, but was a respectable man, who had held several offices of honor in Haldimand, and had been recommended by several persons, including a prominent Grit politician. The hon. gentleman then read a series of affidavits contradicting the Minister of Justice. The Sheriff of the county of Haldimand, in an affidavit, stated that a man named Charles Young was convicted on May 2nd, 1879, of stealing wheat, and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, which he served in Brant jail. Mr. Wesley Coulter, barrister, swore in the affidavit that he had censured Dr. Langrill, the returning officer, for appointing Young, and had told him Young was an ex-convict. Subsequent to that warning Young was reappointed. Mr. T. Montmanagh, of Oneida, swore he knew Deputy Returning Officer Young and that he was the man who had been convicted of theft. In the face of the evidence there was no escaping the fact that Deputy Returning Officer Young was an ex-convict. The Government had taken upon themselves power to appoint returning officers and were responsible for the men appointed by those officials. This same Dr. Langrill, who appointed the ex-convict, was an applicant for the position of physician for the Indian reserves. The Government now knew all the facts. It was in their power to purge themselves from all suspicion of complicity with either the returning officer or the ex-convict by inflicting some appropriate punishment. If they failed to do that, the Opposition would know the reason why and the country would know the reason why. He asked for an explanation, and reserved his right for future action.

Mr. Thompson said the policy of the last speaker in attacking returning officers on all possible occasions was a most extraordinary one, in view of the fact that after an unusual number of election petitions arising from the late general election not one of the very few charges that had been preferred against returning officers had been sustained.

Sir Richard Cartwright—Take the case of Dunn

Mr. Thompson said the hon. member and his friends had Dunn brought to the bar of the House day after day, but they had not the courage to formulate a single charge against him. He contended that the Government had no control over deputy-returning officers, and were in no way responsible for them. Not one name in a hundred of the names of the deputies ever came under the notice of the Government. Their appointment rested entirely with the returning officers. It was as much out of place for Sir Richard Cartwright to inquire about any private citizen. Further, there was no justification offered for the attack upon the character of this man in so far as his conduct of the election was concerned.

Sir Richard Cartwright said he was informed certain irregularities had occurred during the election, that ballots were improperly rejected at the poll, and that the County Judge at the recount had restored to Coulter the votes which Young had deprived him of.

Mr. Laurier said the shameful fact remained that an ex-convict had been selected to stand as umpire between the parties in a closely contested election, and the responsibility for his appointment rested solely upon the Government, who had the appointment of returning officer. If the Government insisted upon choosing their own creatures as returning officers, they must be responsible for the conduct of the appointees of those officers.

Sir John Macdonald said the Government accepted the responsibility for the alteration in the law, by which returning officers are appointed by the Government. That alteration was forced upon the Government by experience. They found that the Conservative party had no fair play, at least so far as the Province of Ontario was concerned, because when the Government of that Province had control of the returning officers they put the screws on those officers for the purpose of defeating the Conservative candidates. There was good ground for appointing registrars to this position under the old Canadian regime, because then these officers were appointed during good behavior, but now it was different. The Government were aware from the reports received that pressure was put by members of the Provincial Government of Ontario upon their officers to aid in the defeat of the Conservative candidates.

Mr. Desjardins said that in the elections of the Province of Quebec the local Liberal Government exerted undue influence over the returning officers.

Mr. Madill said the Ontario Government had in some cases appointed ex-penitentiary convicts to positions of justices of the peace.

Mr. Paterson (Brant) said he thought the House should know from the Minister of Justice by whom he was informed that Young had never served a term in jail. Among the affidavits was one to the effect that the returning officer had been warned before appointing Young a second time that he was an ex-convict, and if such were the case he was greatly to blame. He censured the action of the Government in connection with the Queen's (New Brunswick) election.

Mr. Thompson said he had not accepted the proof which had been sprung upon the House. It was a point on which the Government had no responsibility. Notwithstanding that, however, he would be exceedingly sorry if in any way he had misled the House. He had been misled himself if the statements laid before the House were correct.

Sir Richard Cartwright—I will lay the affidavits on the table.

Mr. Rykert—You had better keep them.

Sir John Macdonald—They do not amount to much.

Sir Richard Cartwright said the position taken by the Government was tantamount to a declaration that in the mind of hon. gentlemen ex-convicts were fit and proper persons to be returning officers. (Cries of "No, no.") If they were not proper persons the Government should deal out punishment to the returning-officer who appointed one. Under the present system of the Government appointing returning officers no human being believed it was possible to obtain impartiality.

Mr. Patterson (Essex) challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to name any objectionable returning-officer that had been appointed. (A voice—Dunn.) Wherever possible the Government had chosen the sheriff or registrar to act as returning-officer.

The House went into committee of the whole on the Bill to amend the Adulteration Act. On the clause declaring that the term "food" included every article used for food or drink by man or cattle, and every ingredient intended for mixing with that food,

Mr. Costigan explained that it was intended to bring baking powder within the scope of the Act.

Mr. Paterson (Brant) objected to Government employees being paid extra for any work they did outside their usual routine.

Mr. Davies—It would be a charity to give them some work to do.

Mr. Costigan said he desired power to send officials from Ottawa to Toronto or Hamilton to collect samples, because being strangers they could do the work easier. In the same way he could send officers from Toronto to Montreal to collect samples. It would be cheaper to use the Inland Revenue officers at a slight expense than to appoint special inspectors for this purpose.

It being 6 o'clock, Mr. Speaker left the chair.

CAME BACK TO LIFE.

The Peculiar Case of Mrs. Emma Althouse, Who Wakes From a Sleep of Thirty-Three Days.

The awakening of Mrs. Emma Althouse from her last sleep or trance of thirty-three days is told in the Attica, N.Y., News. She feebly opened her eyes, but could see nothing at first. It was 8.25 in the evening, the time at which she usually wakes from her long slumbers. She inquired about her sister Katie and said: "For mercy's sake, do not let me go back to sleep again else I shall never again awake!"

When told that she had been asleep 33 days she manifested the utmost surprise. Upon gaining sufficient strength, the doctor asked what she had seen and done while in her trance. She was too weak to remember. Leaning down closer, he whispered: "What shall I tell them?" (referring to those in the room).

"I do not know. How is grandpa?"

"He is much worse," evasively answered the doctor, fearing to shock the patient.

Opening wide her eyes she exclaimed, "Why, he is dead. I know he is dead."

Her grandfather died shortly after she went asleep, and it puzzles her friends and physicians to know how she learned the fact. The following day she felt drowsy and took a nap, and was awakened an hour later without much trouble. After that she felt no desire for either sleep or food. She is in considerable pain from an abscess in her left side near the lung and her left arm is lifeless, caused by the bursting of a blood vessel. Her body is almost rigid, but her eyes are alert. She is sometimes thirsty and with great difficulty a few spoonfuls of milk have been given her.

Is It Haggai's Signet?

A shaft sunk outside the great walls of the city of Jerusalem, near the southwest angle, disclosed an ancient pavement 23 feet beneath the present surface, and 20 feet below that a second pavement. There, amid fragments of pottery and glass, a gentleman's seal was found. It is about the size worn to-day in gentlemen's rings, and is a finely-grained black stone, inscribed "Haggai, the son of Shebnaiah." The letters resemble those employed during the age of the captivity in Babylon. The prophet Haggai was one of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel. "He is,' says Mr. King, "the only one of the minor prophets who mentions a signet, and one can imagine him holding the ring on his finger before the leader's eyes to emphasize the words which close the book of prophecy which has come down to us under his name: 'I will take thee, O Zerubbabel, my servant, the son of Shealtiel, saith the Lord, and will make thee as a signet; for I have chosen thee, saith the Lord of hosts.'"—Ancient Cities.

Can't Rhyme for Shucks.

Chicago Tribune: "'Have you read any of the late poems, Miss Howjames,' said the young man, brightening up, 'written by Walt Whitman for the New York Her—.' 'I am not in the habit of reading anything written by the person you mention,' replied the Boston young lady, with freezing dignity. 'Well, to tell the truth,' stammered the young man from St. Louis, 'I am not dead stuck on him myself. He can't rhyme for shucks. He makes anxiety rhyme with nitro-glycerine.'"

One Result of the Kaiser's Death.

One effect of the late Emperor's death is that fully 30,000 of the Germans resident in England who evaded the conscription and the call to arms on the breaking out of the Franco-Prussian war will be now free to visit the Fatherland without incurring the risk of being tried by court-martial as deserters, as their offence is only coeval with the late Emperor's reign.

An Awful Spring Dream.

The New Year—to Come.

Dedicated to the International Council of Women.

You must wake and call me early,
Call me early, husband dear,
To-morrow'll be the happiest time
I've known for many a year.
I'll borrow your trousers, husband,
Also your vest and coat,
For I am going to vote, husband,
Your wife is going to vote!

I sleep so sound all night, husband,
That I shall never wake,
If you do not call me loud
When the day begins to break;
But I must gather up the tickets
And the speeches that I wrote,
For I am going to vote, husband,
Your wife is going to vote!

Little Susan shall go with me,
To-morrow to the polls,
To see her noble mother
Put her name upon the rolls;
So you must call me early,
By the rooster's morning note;
For I am going to vote, husband,
Your wife is going to vote!

What the Chimney Sang.

Over the chimney the night wind sang,
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the woman stopped and the babe she tossed
And thought of the one she had long since lost,
And said, as her teardrops back she forced,
"I hate the wind in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang,
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the children said, as they closer drew,
"'Tis some witch that is cleaving the black night through,
'Tis a fairy trumpet that just then blew,
And we fear the wind in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang,
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the man as he sat on his hearth below,
Said to himself "It will surely snow,
And fuel is dear and wages low,
And I'll stop the leak in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang,
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the poet listened and smiled, for he
Was man, and woman, and child, all three,
And said, "It is God's own harmony,
This wind we hear in the chimney."

A SAILOR'S LONG SWIM.

All Night in the Ocean Without Even a Plank to Support Him.

The name of Frank Miller, who has just reached here, says the San Francisco Examiner, on the brig William G. Irwin from the Sandwich Islands, ought to be placed in the temple of fame alongside that of Leander, for he has proven that he possesses an amphibian capacity quite equal to that of the swimmer of the Hellespont. Miller's exploit was out in the Pacific Ocean, and therefore cannot be measured as to distance, but its time was seventeen hours. Three or four months ago he left San Francisco on the whaling vessel Jacob A. Howland, which during its cruising caught two whales near the Sandwich Islands. For a day or two after the killing the vessel was surrounded by sharks eager for the refuse. The vicious creatures swarmed in the wake of the vessel and crowded around her, popping their greedy heads up above the waves in plain sight of the silors. The deck was slippery after the killing, and one evening while Miller was on the port rail forward he missed his footing and pitched headlong into the sea. He thinks he must have floated, unconscious from the shock and from fright at the thought of the sharks, for some time. For with his first consciousness after slipping and falling he looked for the vessel, but could neither see nor hear anything of her. He knew they were not many miles from the shore of the island of Molokai, and guiding himself as best he could by the stars he struck out in the direction which he thought would carry him to its shore. But he was swimming against the tide, and he could feel that he was making but little progress, exert himself as he might. He thought of the sharks, which only a few hours before had been clustering around the vessel, and every five minutes he imagined that one was swashing up against him, while every bright gleam of starlight upon a little wave he was cock-sure was the coldly glittering eye of a hungry shark, intent on making a lunch off him. But morning dawned and he was still uneaten, though so weak from his battle with the waves and his continued fright that he had not the strength to climb upon a couple of planks nailed together that came drifting past him. But he caught hold of them, and managed to sustain himself still longer by their aid. A terrible thirst took possession of him, and as the sun rose higher and higher it almost blistered his face and hands. Finally, about the middle of the afternoon, the brig Irwin came along, saw him and picked him up. His strength was so entirely gone that he had to be lifted over the side of the boat sent after him as if he had been a baby.

A CHEAP hose for watering plants can be made of heavy ducking, says a correspondent of Farm Life. Cut the ducking into strips the width needed to make the size wanted, fold the edges together, and sew twe seams with a sewing machine. Then roll into rolls or balls, and boil in grafting wax, the same as cloth for grafting purposes. "I made 150 feet of such hose," says the correspondent, "to water strawberries and vegetables. I cut the cloth lengthwise, about fifty feet in a section, and then sewed the sections together. It will leak a little, but not enough to amount to anything."

SOME light is thrown upon the recent cable despatch announcing that the eldest son of Lord North had opened a butcher shop by proceedings in bankruptcy against the Hon. SOME one has been collecting facts about the fathers of United States Presidents, with this result: Grover Cleveland is the only clergyman's son who has ever been elected President, though Arthur's father was a clergyman. He was not, however, elected President. The fathers of the Virginia Presidents—Washington, Jefferson, Madison and Monroe—were planters, John Tyler's father was a lawyer and a statesman, and John Adams, the father of John Quincy Adams, was by profession a lawyer. Grant's father was a tanner, Hayes' father a merchant, and the fathers of Garfield, Lincoln, Pierce, Fillmore, Polk, Van Buren and Jackson were farmers.

THE Epping Forest Committee of the corporation of the city of London have prepared a report in which they say the question of the deer has caused them some anxiety. They have increased in numbers to such an extent as to become a source of serious annoyance to some of the surrounding land-owners and farmers, several of whom have claimed compensation for damage to their crops. The Epping Forest Act transferred the deer from the Crown to the conservators to be preserved as an object of ornament, and, bearing in mind that the common rights were originally granted partly as compensation for the damage done by the deer, they have repudiated all liability on the part of the conservators.

IF any man realizes more keenly than the suffering Emperor of Germany, who draws his breath through a silver tube and cannot even eat his morsel of food like a living creature, that "the path of glory leads but to the grave," that man must be ex-Senator Leland Stanford, of California. The railroad prince and millionaire is building a family tomb at San Francisco, which is to cost $100,000, and a correspondent writes: The mausoleum will be completed during the coming summer, and when finished will be a fitting abode for the remains of one of the most successful men of the day—a railroad magnate, a millionaire and a philanthropist, who is building a university that will cost between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000; a man who lives magnificently, with wealth and friends and everything that makes life worth living, yet who has the great sorrow of losing his son, his only child, and when he and his wife are called to another world and their remains occupy their stately tomb, the family history will end.

CURIOUS samples of naturally reduced iron have been found on the North Saskatchewan River in the Northwest Territory, about eighty miles from the town of Edmonton, Alberta. Along the river bank a lignite formation crops out for several miles, overlaid by clay shale and soft argillaceous sandstone containing nodules of clay iron stone. These nodules are similar to others found at Edmonton, and proved by analysis to be carbonates of iron, containing 34.98 per cent. of metallic iron. The Saskatchewan seam of lignite has, at some time or other, been burnt, leaving a bed of ashes, clinkers and burnt clay, in places twenty feet thick, and now covered by a dense growth of grass and underwood. From this mass of burnt clay pieces of metallic iron can be picked out, weighing in some cases fifteen or twenty pounds. They have evidently been reduced from the nodules above mentioned by the heat of the burning lignite. Most of the pieces of iron are much rusted, but when scratched with a file they show a bright surface. The observation is interesting, and to some may help to explain how primitive man originally discovered the reduction of iron ore.

THREE things were sought by the ancient alchemist—the philosopher's stone, the elixir of life and the universal solvent. The last of these, though long known to modern chemistry, has just been separated, but cannot be retained, simply because it attacks or destroys everything. This fury of the chemical world, says Mr. W. Mattieu Williams, is the element fluorine; it exists peacefully in company with calcium in fluor-spar and also in a few other compounds; but, when isolated, as it recently has been by M. Henri Moissan, is a rabid gas that nothing can resist. It combines all the metals, explosively with some, or if they are already combined with some other non-metallic element, it tears them from it, and takes them to itself. In uniting with sodium, potassium, calcium, magnesium and aluminium, the metals become heated even to redness by the fervor of its embrace. Iron filings, slightly warmed, burst into brilliant scintillations when exposed to it; manganese does the same. Even the noble metals, which at a melting heat proudly resist the fascinations of oxygen, succumb to this chemical siren at moderate temperatures. Glass is devoured at once, and water ceases to be water by contact with this gas, which, combining with its hydrogen, at the same mement forms the acrid, glass-dissolving hydrofluoric acid and liberates ozone.

The statement which recently went the rounds that the last surviving servant of Sir Walter Scott had died is incorrect. In Kirkhill there resides a woman, Margaret Thomson, who was in the service of the great novelist when he died. At the age of 16 Margaret went to Abbotsford as scullery-maid, where she remained two years, when, on Sir Walter taking the journey to Naples for his health, she, with a number of other servants, was discharged. On his return, however, she was re-engaged as kitchen-maid. She is now 74 years of age, the mother of four children, who are all in honorable positions, is comparatively healthy and still full of "auld warld cracks."

Lord Dufferin's Movements.

"Lord Dufferin's stay at Rome will be very brief," says London Truth, "and, indeed, it is highly probable that he will not take up his appointment as successor to Sir John Saville. I understand that Sir Robert Morier will certainly leave St. Petersburg in November, and Sir William White is to be his successor, he being replaced at Constantinople by Lord Dufferin. Sir Robert Morier will most likely go to Rome."

Signs of Spring

A daub of paint on the skirt of your best coat.

The paperer leaves a half finished job in the kitchen.

More mud in the front hall than there ought to be in the flower garden.

The worst cold you've had since December.

A hat too good to throw away and too much worn to look well.

London, Ont., Talent Abroad.

Bob Murray, the London, Ont., man, who is to be tried next month for murder, is running a saloon at Fort Smith, Ark., and they say is raking in dollars where he couldn't make cents in Michigan. It is the most popular thing on the schedule in the southwest to be under indictment for killing a man.

LIFE AT THE POLE.

How Things Proceed Where Days are Six Months Long.

If they ever find the North Pole, and it becomes colonized, they are going to have an awful time of it. They will have daylight six months and darkness six months out of the year. There is a certain limit of trouble and ingenuity beyond which immortality will not go. The limit is far enough off at the best, but if it were night for six months on end what would become of us? Husbands would never go home at all. Parties would only be divided by the time necessary to recruit exhausted nature; a woman would need a new dress every four hours, because she couldn't go to more than two parties in the same dress, and it would be an awful hardship to do even that. They would say:

"Why, do look at Mrs. ——. She wore that same dress at the Smith's just ten hours ago."

"Are you going to the theatre now?"

"No; I saw the piece already to-night."

"Get up."

"What time is it?"

"Don't know; but I put you to bed in a miserable condition six hours since, and we are due at the Jones'."

"Well, wait till I get my breakfast, or supper, or dinner; which is it anyhow?"

"Don't remember; it is my 116th meal this season."

"Don't light the gas yet. I only saved $1,000,000, and that gas bill is getting prodigious. A new dress! That's the fifteenth in 175 hours."

"Great Scott! the metre's busted and the electric wire's broken. Where are my boots?"

And the daylight would be confusing. A man would never know when to leave his business. Newspapers would be published just when everything happened, which would be very frequently.

"Come on; let's go home."

"Hold on; just one game more."

"We've been at it just 48 hours now by the watch."

"Where's my dinner?"

"Really, my dear, I didn't think it was so long since the last meal, and I've been shopping."

"Shopping! You came home from shopping just before I went out, and woke me up to borrow money for car fare."

"This bonnet is worn out. I can't be seen on the street with it again."

"Julius Cæsar! You've only had it two hours."

"Yes; but every woman I know has seen it by this time."

"Got a lawn tennis party in fifteen minutes, you say? Well, you've only come in from boating. You won't see the winter if you go on like this. No, I haven't had but three drinks since I left home."

"By the way, John, I want you to drive me out to the park."

"I can't; I'm sleepy. I've been up thirty-six hours."

"Well, I've only seen you fifteen minutes."

"I can't help that; you know perfectly well the photographing business will have to shut up pretty soon, and I've got to make all I can out of it now."

Just think, however, the trying position of men who would like to get full.

"Look at Mr. Jones! Well, I never! Staggering along the street in broad daylight! I am ashamed of him!"

And all the neighbors watching Jones trying to find a keyhole in the fence, and perhaps taking his clothes off outside of the door. Of course there will be compensation for such people in the winter. Night was evidently intended by nature to enable the exercise of the objectionable propensities of the human, anyway.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Nothing Like It!

Every day swells the volume of proof that as a specific for all Blood diseases, nothing equals Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Remember, this is an old established remedy with a record! It has been weighed in the balance and found fulfilling every claim! It has been tested many years in thousands of cases with flattering success! For Throat and Lung troubles, Catarrh, Kidney disease, Liver Complaint, Dyspepsia, Sick Headache and all disorders resulting from impoverished blood, there is nothing like Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery—world renowned and ever growing in favor

Within a week two children have lost their lives through swallowing toy balloons, and in neither case was the cause of strangulation discovered till after death. In both instances the obstruction in the throat could have been removed in time had those present known what the trouble was.

"If a woman is pretty,
To me 'tis no matter,
Be she blonde or brunette.
So she lets me look at her.

An unhealthy woman is rarely, if ever, beautiful. The peculiar diseases to which so many of the sex are subject are prolific causes of pale, sallow faces, blotched with unsightly pimples, dull, lustreless eyes and emaciated forms. Women so afflicted can be permanently cured by using Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription; and with the restoration of health comes that beauty which, combined with good qualities of head and heart, makes women angels of loveliness. "Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

She Gave Him Back the Ring.

In a New York Court yesterday, Mrs. Linnie Von Prochazka threw her wedding ring at the feet of the man she is suing for divorce.

Joy in Every Drop.

This may be truly said of Polson's Nerviline, the greatest pain remedy of the age. It brings comfort to the weary sufferer when failure has attended the use of every known remedy. Nerviline is an absolute cure for all kinds of pain, internal, external, or local. Purchase a 10 cent sample bottle and try this great remedy, Nerviline, nerve pain cure. Don't forget the name. At any drug store.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

A rich Philadelphia woman, noted for her wealth and eccentricity, wears a striking ring on one of her thumbs.

How's Your Liver?

The old lady who replied, when asked how her liver was, "God bless me, I never heard that there was such a thing in the house," was noted for her amiability. Prometheus, when chained to a rock, might as well have pretended to be happy as the man who is chained to a diseased liver. For poor Prometheus there was no escape, but by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, the disagreeable feelings, irritable temper, constipation, indigestion, dizziness and sick headache, which are caused by a diseased liver, promptly disappear.

Aiming at Originality.

Book Dealer (to customer)—In selecting a library, madam, you will, of course, want a set of Dickens' works, complete.

Society Dame—No, I think not. Everybody has Dickens' works.—From Puck.

WHAT AILS YOU?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Disease, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

Dr Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

CURES ALL HUMORS,

from a common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands. Send ten cents in stamps for a large Treatise, with colored plates, on Skin Diseases, or the same amount for a Treatise on Scrofulous Affections.

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse it by using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, vital strength and bodily health will be established.

CONSUMPTION,

which is Scrofula of the Lungs, is arrested and cured by this remedy, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease. From its marvelous power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now world-famed remedy to the public, Dr. Pierce thought seriously of calling it his "CONSUMPTION CURE," but abandoned that name as too restrictive for a medicine which, from its wonderful combination of tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, anti-bilious, pectoral, and nutritive properties, is unequaled, not only as a remedy for Consumption, but for all Chronic Diseases of the Liver, Blood, and Lungs.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Severe Coughs, and kindred affections, it is an efficient remedy.

Sold by Druggists, at $1.00, or Six Bottles for $5.00.

Cattle fair on Monday was not as well attended as usual, owing to the fact that the farmers were too busy tilling the soil to leave off work and come out to town.

Wm. Richardson is one of the oldest Seedsman in the County of Grey, and Seeds procured from him have given good satisfaction.

A meeting of the patrons of Flesherton Station Creamery will be held at McInnes Hotel on Saturday, May 12th, to appoint auditors for coming season.

R. H. COOK.

Mr. D. Forsythe, of Uxbridge Township, is the guest of his daughter, Mrs. J. Koster, of this place. Notwithstanding his four score years, Mr. Forsyth is a hale, hearty old gentleman.

When you find the weather warm, nothing is more delicious than a dish of Ice Cream, which can be obtained at Miss Hind's residence, just over the Boyne bridge, Flesherton.

Demonstration proves the fact that in Seeds you get the best at W. E. Richardson's, Flesherton.

The Toronto Mail had an article anent Flesherton recently, in which our town is depicted in glowing colors. The writer has a level head and can tell a good thing when he sees it.

It would be a sensible idea to build a sidewalk along Beechel street, also one from the corner opposite Mr. Edw. Whitten's residence to the corner of the same street and Collingwood street.

For Seeds, Carrots, Turnips and all kinds of Field & Garden Seeds go to Richardson's Drug Store.

LIME BURNER WANTED—to burn lime in the kiln at Little Falls Saw Mill. 100 cords slab wood now on hand and plenty of limestone convenient. House and garden land convenient.—W. HOGG

Quite a number of trees were planted on our beautiful Public school grounds on Arbor Day. Principal Irwin, assisted by many pupils, also by Mr. Wm. Neil, worked hard in connection therewith and accomplished much. A number of citizens have mutually agreed to plant trees in front of their respective properties some day this week.

A certain youth has been in the habit of calling at various business places in Flesherton, selecting some article, and instructing those who have waited on him to put it to one side until called for. As a matter of fact he usually calls a second time, but not for the article selected. He makes some excuse and selects a fresh article with the usual instructions to "keep it for him," &c. The youth in question has been spotted and will strike a snag the next time he repeats his performance. It is for the good of his health that we publish this item.

If you want a thorough Outfit of Fishing Tackle go to W. E. Richardson.

Don't Do It, Boys.

There is a Township by-law which prohibits ball playing on public streets and highways of Artemesia. Don't forget this fact boys, for it is the intention to enforce the by-law in question in future.

Will Visit England.

In a few weeks Mr Suggitt, of Eugenia—formerly Township Collector of Osprey—will sail for England, where he will spend some time visiting his many old friends there. May he have a pleasant trip and a safe return.

Toronto Township Heard From.

In the matter of prolific stock, the next we hear from is Mr. Jas. Carberry of Toronto Township. A sow belonging to him recently had a litter of 16 pigs and all doing well; also 12 lambs from 6 ewes, and all doing well. One of the ewes had three lambs.

Kansas Letter.

Mr. and Mrs. Reid, of this town, recently received a letter from a friend, who lives in Kansas, from which we propose to take a few extracts next week that will open the eyes of people who have Kansas and other Western States on the brain.

Scott Act Busted.

The Scott Act is dead, and now the next thing will be something else. But none of these things move Booth, the Boss Barber, Flesherton. He leads the procession in the barbering business as usual.

Several Fools Said So.

"Do you know," said a certain individual accosting a member of THE ADVANCE staff the other day, "I believe your boss is nothing but a downright fool, and you can tell him so from me!"

"Yes," replied the member of our staff yawning, "several fools have told me the same thing—especially since the boss wrote that article about supporting home!"

Strain Bros.

The Morning Rustler is the name of a smart little daily paper published in the town of Minot, Dakota, U. S. Nearly half of one page is taken up by Strain Bros., sons of Mr. Wm. Strain, Flesherton to advertise their business. Strain Bros. were formerly in Mr. M. Richardson's store here, where they acquired a thorough knowledge of the merchantile business, and we believe the happy knack of judicious advertising. Long may they flourish!

Farmers, Look out for Swindlers.

From the Shelburne Free Press.

ANOTHER SWINDLE.—An adroit swindler has been working a quiet game by which he has reaped a rich harvest. He circulated among the farmers and bought cattle, for which he paid in checks which were bonafide and were honored by the local banks, where the sharper had money on deposit. But he never called for his cattle. On the contrary, about the time the farmers were looking for him to come after them they received notice that the little receipts they signed when their certified checks were handed them had grown into notes about five times as large as the checks.

Brampton Responsible.

It was really a pitiable sight to see lettie Charlie Ellison being taken to gaol yesterday to enter upon a month's imprisonment, the result of his stealing $41 out of John Jeffers' till last Friday. What a terrible beginning for a young boy. It all comes of idleness and being out late at night. Parents who are allowing their children to stray away from school and run the streets, are making of them the future occupants of our gaols and penitentiaries. It is one of the duties of the Public Schools Trustees to see that children attend school, but they don't attend to it.—Peel Banner.

Got His Finger Taken Off.

On Saturday evening last Mr. Guy Blakely, of the firm of Blakely & McConnell, butchers here, met with rather a bad accident. He was backing his horse and buggy out of Mr. Heard's carriage factory, when in some peculiar manner the little finger of his right hand dropped between the "circle" and another part of the buggy and was completely severed from the hand by the sudden jolting of the vehicle over a plank. We may add that the "circle" is the round piece of metal connected with what is known as the "running gear" of a buggy and is located midway between the two front wheels of that vehicle to facilitate the various movements necessary in passing other vehicles, etc.

A Well Conducted Business.

One of the most noted establishments in the county of Grey is Russell's noted jewelry store, Flesherton. The manager thereof does not need to blow about his "honesty" or "reliability" because these facts are patent to all. No such splendid work has ever been turned out in this district as that daily done at Russell's. It is suspicious when a jeweller has to hawk his wares around through neighboring villages and sell them by auction to the highest bidders. It shows either that he is trying to force business by questionable means, or that he has an inferior class of goods which he is determined to get rid of at any cost. At Russell's business is carried on quite differently, and, from the constantly increasing patronage, we should judge the people are much better satisfied. People don't care—the better class of them—to deal with traveling jewelry peddlers!

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

He spoke so quietly that Ruby did not guess what intense self-command he had to exercise to answer her at all, and she felt a little vague disappointment. Had he conquered his love for Shirley? she wondered. Was that his reason for making peace with Sir Hugh? Had he forgiven him because his anger had all died away? And yet the grave face was very true and steadfast. Guy Stuart did not look like a man who could love and cease to love at will.

Watching Shirley furtively with his grave gray eyes, Guy Stuart felt more and more as if he were in a dream. It was so strange and unreal to be near her once more and not to be on the old sweet familiar terms. Not a movement of hers, hardly a word she spoke, escaped him; his senses seemed all quickened and intensified, although after their first short greeting they did not exchange a word. He noted the languid calm of her manner, her haughty indifference, so unlike the sweet graciousness of old, and he saw too, with a thrill of pain and pleasure which he could not repress, the change—perceptible only to one who knew her as well as he did—which came over her face and manner when she answered her husband. Moreover, he saw how the pain deepened on Sir Hugh's handsome face.

Shirley herself never remembered how that evening passed; it seemed to her as if Alice's eyes were watching her every movement, exercising a ceaseless espionage over her words and looks, and as if she must bear herself even more proudly than usual under the scrutiny. She knew that she talked, and even sung when they asked her, with a very vague impression of the words she uttered and the song she sung; but she knew also that the old sense of rest and peace and happiness which she had always felt in Guy's presence was coming back to her heart, and that she strove against it in vain. Was it wrong? she wondered; she had suffered so much, she was surely justified in feeling a little happy now! And then she found herself bidding Alice good-night, and she heard her husband's voice, with an unusual tone of hesitation and entreaty, asking Major Stuart if he would go to see them. Shirley's heart beat quickly as she waited for the answer. There was a slight pause—so slight as to be almost imperceptible—and then Guy answered in the affirmative; and Shirley put her small fingers into his for a moment before they were placed upon Lord Eastwell's arm to allow him to lead her to the carriage.

"Stuart seems inclined to be friendly," Sir Hugh said, when he and Shirley were driving away in their luxurious well appointed carriage, speaking with an indifference which was assumed in vain for his purpose. "I wonder if he will come to see us? He said he would."

"He generally keeps his word," Shirley answered, with her usual icy indifference.

"I hope not always. I remember, last time we met, he was going to——" A slight movement which Shirley made silenced him for a moment; then he went on lightly, "I suppose he thinks I did not do him such a terrible injury as he thought at the time. He need not envy me my wife!"

"No," Shirley answered, with sudden bitterness, looking steadily out at the lighted streets as they drove on.

"Or perhaps he has a wife of his own, and she has taught him to be charitable," said Sir Hugh, rather unsteadily. What would he not have given to rouse Shirley into anything like resentment, into a betrayal of feeling or passion

"Perhaps," assented Shirley relapsing into her usual indifference.

"I wish him joy!" said her husband bitterly; and they were silent for the rest of the way.

CHAPTER XXVIII

"Major Stuart is in the drawing-room, my lady."

"Very well, Cobbett. Ask Major Stuart to wait for me one minute

"Yes, my lady."

The powdered footman who had made the announcement disappeared, and Lady Glynn put aside the book she had been reading as she rose to go down to her visitor.

She was dressed, as usual, in perfect taste, and there was no sign of perturbation in her manner as she went down-stairs to receive the man who, but for an untoward fate, would have been her husband; but Guy knew her face too well not to see what intense pain and pleasure this, her first interview alone with him, gave her.

He was standing by the window of the drawing-room when she entered, and she was close beside him before he heard her; then, with a start, he turned and saw her standing, slim and graceful, in her dark velvet dress with soft old laces at throat and wrists.

She held out her hand to him in silence, and equally in silence he took it for a moment in his strong clasp; as he released it, it fell heavily at her side. Then she said very softly, but in a voice which was like music, it was so wondrously sweet and melodious—

"I am very glad to see you. It was very good of you to come."

"You thought I would come?" he said, with a kindly smile. "I am fortunate in finding you at home."

"I am generally home from three to five. One cannot be always on the treadmill you know."

"On the treadmill!" he repeated, looking at her with a quick questioning glance.

"Yes, the round of fashion," she answered nervously, linking her white fingers together with a gesture of pain. "I don't think the treadmill can be much worse."

"I suppose it is wearisome and monotonous at times; but the season is not a very long one, you know."

"Not a very long one?" she questioned, with a little sigh.

"No, certainly not. And every position has its duties," he answered, with gentle gravity.

"You left yours to take care of themselves for a long time," she said suddenly, looking at him, as they stood at the window facing each other, with quick reproach and pain.

Major Stuart's face changed slightly. It had been grave and quiet before; it grew graver and quieter now, and there was an added pain about the lips under his dark moustache which Lady Glynn caught.

"Forgive me," Shirley said softly. "I ought not to have said that. Will you not sit down?"

She moved away from him as she spoke, with an uncertain restless movement very unlike her usual languid grace. His eyes, full of wistful pain, followed her, and the thought crossed him whether it had been wise to come.

"We have met several times," she said, in a low ill-assured tone, "since that first evening, but I have never had an opportunity of thanking you for your goodness then. Will you let me do so now?"

"You will not do so, unless you wish to pain me terribly," he answered hurriedly. "Even if I had not given a promise to my uncle, do you think so meanly of me as to believe that I had kept malice in my heart for four long years, Shirley?"

The color rose slowly and painfully in her face, and her eyes fell before his.

"You promised your uncle?" she said, rallying a little. "When?"

"On his death bed."

"He died—when?"

"He died three days after I left you in Scotland."

He spoke with evident effort, but with perfect calm, although under his bronze the pallor deepened to ghastliness.

"And you could forgive even then?" she said, lifting her eyes to his with a swift reproach.

"Even then," he replied gently. "It was hardly more bitter pain then, Shirley, than it is now. It was not easy for me to forgive," he added earnestly—"not easy—ah, no!"

"It is easier now?" she said quickly. "You can see the wrong is not so great as it seemed then? No—oh, no, do not go—do not leave me, and in anger! I will not vex you again."

"You do not vex me—you pain me unutterably," he said; and his voice was a little strained, for all its gentleness.

"Do I? Then I will not. Tell me of yourself. You were so long a time a wanderer that you must have brought home many a story and narrative."

"Nothing likely to interest you much," he said quietly. "I am not a good raconteur, you know."

"You used not to be," she answered; and there was a little embarrassed pause, during which the thoughts of both wandered back to the past, the old sweet, bitter past which lay cold and dead between them now. "Ruby tells me that you often go to them," she said presently.

"Yes, they are very good in wishing to have me, and it gives me great pleasure."

"Oswald is greatly improved?"

"Yes. He is a young man to have the responsibility of a wife and family," said Guy, smiling. "But he is very happy. In his case at least Shakspeare is proved in the wrong when he said a young man married is a young man marred."

"I suppose there are exceptions to every rule," rejoined Shirley. "They are happy enough."

"Yes; there is my beau-ideal of what a home should be," Guy said; then, very gently and gravely, bending forward a little toward her as she sat, her rich velvet dress falling around her, her little jewelled hands lying idly in her lap, he added. "Why is not yours a happy home, Shirley?"

"Mine," she exclaimed in agitated tones—"mine! How can it be?"

"Why should it not be?"

"Can you ask?" she said, with passionate reproach flashing into her lustrous eyes.

"Yes, I ask you," he answered in the same gentle manner. "I am an old friend, and you must give me a friend's privileges. Why are you not happy in your home, Shirley."

"How can I be happy? How could I be happy—trapped, betrayed as I was into a marriage in which there is neither love nor respect?" she asked passionately. "Are you forgetting what is past, Guy? Are you——"

"I am forgetting nothing," he said gently still. "Is it likely that I should? But your husband loves you, and——"

"Loves me!" she echoed wildly. "I prefer hate to such love as that!"

"Hush—oh, hush, my child!" Guy cried earnestly. "It breaks my heart to hear you speak so bitterly. Dear, is it possible that during all this time you have not forgiven your husband and the wrong he did you in the past, that you have cherished anger and hatred and malice in your heart against him?"

"I have not forgiven him," she said passionately—"I never will forgive him! He has no right to expect it. How can I forgive him?" she went on, rising and restlessly clasping and unclasping her little hands. "When I think—oh, when I think, I feel as if I must go mad with the recollection of my wrongs! Can you guess what my life has been," she asked turning to Guy, who had risen also, with a look of intense pain on his grave face, "forced me to live in outward concord with a man whom I despise and detest and abhor, forced to bear his touch, his caress, his kiss? It has been horrible beyond all words—beyond all description. Oh, Guy, let me tell you! All these years I have borne my sorrow in silence because there was no one whom I could trust, whom I could speak to, and it seemed sometimes as if my heart must burst with its load of anguish."

"Shirley," he said brokenly, his face white as death, his hands trembling at the passion and desolation of her manner, "I cannot hear you; it is not right."

"Ah, let me tell you!" she entreated, looking up at him with earnest child-like trust. "I do not often give way thus; but it will be such comfort to tell you! Sometimes it has seemed as if my brain must burst, my temples throb so, and I am obliged to smile and go into Society not to let people guess. Oh, if I were not so strong that I might die! Or, if I could kill him—if I could kill him!"

"Shirley!"

The gentle pained voice, the touch of his hand upon her hot trembling fingers, the expression of the dark gray eyes which looked at her with such sorrow and pain, brought tears, and she bowed her head upon her hands, weeping passionately and unrestrainedly; and he did not try to stop the bitter tears—they could not fail to ease the overcharged heart and throbbing brain. But how hard—how terribly hard—it was then to keep his promise to his uncle only Guy Stuart knew. He paced up and down the beautiful room, not daring to trust himself to look at the bowed drooping figure, trying to shut his ears to the broken heart-rending sobs—but in vain. His hands were clinched until the nails almost entered the flesh, and he ground his teeth together in a fury to which no words could have given vent.

He loved her so madly, he pitied her with such an intense pity, he longed with such a heartfelt longing to be able to console and comfort her! Were there no means by which he could deliver her from this bondage? Was there no road which led to peace at least, if not to happiness? And, look which way he might, he could distinguish none save through the paths of sin and crime and dishonor. And must such paths be trodden? Did he love her well enough, or did he love her too well for that?

CHAPTER XXIX.

"Did you ever see anything more lovely?" asked Lucie Grey softly, as her gray eyes—such frank kindly gray eyes they were, inspiring trust and confidence—eyes that were fitting windows to the gentle and honest soul which made the Vicar of Easton's eldest daughter so justly beloved in his parish—strayed over the lovely landscape lying before her, which the sun was flooding with a rich golden light and haze that gave it yet more wondrous beauty than Nature had already bestowed upon it.

The Vicar's three daughters had been spending a luxurious half holiday on the cliffs, and had enjoyed it to the uttermost. It was not often that their busy lives gave them leisure for dreaming away a few hours among the rocks, for Mr. Grey's living was not a very remunerative one, and his family was large, so that Lucie and Ada, and even bright little Bessie, his third daughter, although she was not yet sixteen, found plenty to do in assisting their delicate mother in her household labors; teaching the little ones, helping their father in his parish work, mothers' meetings and district visiting, coal, blanket, and clothing clubs, penny-readings and Sunday-school teaching being a few of their multifarious duties.

Perhaps it was its rarity which always made a holiday seem such a thoroughly enjoyable day to these girls. Any one coming upon them as they lingered upon the rocks would have seen a picture of perfect and innocent enjoyment.

Lucie had been sketching; but she had put aside her drawing materials now, and was letting her eyes rest with delight on the scene before her—the calm smiling sea with the golden haze upon it, the blue sky overhead, the coast—such a coast as only a Devon or Cornwall can boast—stretching far on either side in abrupt outlines and undulations, and the quaint little town of Easton itself, lying in the hollow formed, as it were, by a break in the long lines of cliff which had left a chasm. Behind them the cliffs rose rugged and bold, and far and wide the coast stretched in points and headlands and bays and crescents, with here and there a space far down on the cliff-side which had been cleared for building, or where some wealthy person had erected a charming summer residence in sight of the sea and shore.

Easton itself, with its one long, quaint, irregular street, ran in a scattered manner down to the very beach itself, the sea almost washing the bases of some of the houses. The harbor was a small but picturesque one, and it gave refuge to the fisher boats by which the fishing population obtained their living from the deep waters. The Grey girls loved the quaint little town dearly; they had not time to feel its dulness and monotony; and the deep love of nature which they had imbibed from their father made the scenery around some of the fairest in England—a constant delight to them.

Their pleasure in it now was as great as if their eyes had never dwelt on it before. Lucie contemplated it with a feeling of delight mixed with despair at her inability to reproduce such beauty. Ada, stretched beside her, with her head on her sister's lap, looked at it dreamily, letting its loveliness soothe her with a sense of peace and rest; and Bessie stood behind, pausing in her occupation of preparing tea, at Lucie's earnestly spoken question, to let her glance rest upon it too.

"Do you think it looks more lovely than usual, Lulu?" she asked saucily, after a minute's silent admiration.

"It always has a fresh loveliness for me," Lucie answered, smiling. "And I believe you enjoy it just as much as Ada or myself."

"Of course I think it jollier living at Easton than in a poky old town," Bessie said jauntily. "But I don't go in for artistic tastes like you and Ada. For instance, the prospect of 'bliss' is a much pleasanter one to me than that prospect," she added merrily, jerking her chin toward the golden-shadowed sea.

"'Bliss'!" said Ada, sitting eagerly and looking round Lucie's camp stool toward her younger sister's preparations for tea. "Do you mean to say that we are to have 'bliss' for tea?"

Bessie nodded emphatically.

"I do," she said.

"My eternal gratitude is yours," Ada rejoined, with a sigh of content, for the delicacy, composed of clotted cream and jam and cake, which Bessie in her childish days had called "bliss," because it was better than happiness, was a favorite dish of hers.

"What a blissful sight!" remarked Bessie demurely, intent upon trying to induce the little kettle upon the spirit-lamp to stand on its somewhat unsteady base.

"Bessie"—Ada sat up again, and looked at her sister with solemnly reproving eyes "did I hear aright, or did my ears deceive me?"

"It was a very bad pun, Ada," said Lucie merrily, "so we will ignore it."

"There is one thing certain," Ada declared, settling herself comfortably once more—"if Dr. Johnson were still in existence and had chanced to pass this way, Mr. Easton's third daughter would not be alive at this present moment."

"Thank goodness, he is non est," laughed Bessie. "We get enough of him in the dictionary. Hurrah! It is boiling at last! Ada, the supreme moment is approaching!"

"Something or some one else is approaching too," Ada said, laughing. "What a bore! Who can it be? Look, Lucie—you are not near sighted as I am."

Lucie turned her head and looked for a moment steadily at a solitary figure coming toward them across the beach, for the girls had encamped in the shadow of the cliff among some bowlders of rock which were a favorite resort. The sunshine did not touch the strip of shingle over which the solitary graceful woman's figure was advancing, and to Lucie's gentle eyes it seemed a very desolate and lonely one.

"I think it must be one of the grandees who have taken the 'Pack of Cards' for the summer months," said Bessie, looking also. "What a nuisance! I dislike languid fine ladies above all things"

"Having had so much experience," Ada put in slyly.

"I've read of them," said Bessie contemptously—"fainting if they cut their fingers, and going into hysterics if they see a spider! Even mother said Lady Eastwell was horrid."

"I don't think our mother said that, Bessie," opposed Lucie gently, not removing her eyes from the slowly advancing figure, which she was watching with an intent gaze.

"Well, I am sure she did not like her manner," amended Bessie carelessly, "nor Mrs. Beaudesert."

"This is neither Mrs. Beaudesert nor Lady Eastwell," said Lucie, a little tender pitying tone coming into her voice. "I think it is Lady Glynn."

"Lady Glynn!" Ada started up eagerly. "Is it, do you think? I do not think she is strong enough to walk so far. You know it was partly for her health they came down here."

"It is she nevertheless," said Lucie, quietly; and, as the slim graceful figure came nearer with its slow languid step, Miss Grey went forward to meet it, forgetting entirely that Lady Glynn was one of the "great ladies" who had come to enjoy the Easton sea breezes, in her tender pity for the pallor and weariness of the lovely face which she had seen once or twice at church and once in the Vicarage drawing-room, when Shirley had come on foot in her simple cambric dress, too delicately minded to exhibit her wealth before the poor clergyman's family, to call on the vicar's wife.

Shirley's face brightened suddenly and swiftly as her eyes met Lucie's; she had liked what little she had seen of the Greys so much that it gave her unfeigned pleasure to meet the girls

"Have you not walked a little too far, Lady Glynn?" Lucie said gently. "It was not very prudent."

"The air was so pleasant and the afternoon so lovely that they tempted me," returned Shirley, smiling. "Besides, your fresh sea-breezes have done me a world of good, Miss Grey. But I fear," she added, with a glance at Bessie's preparations, "that I am intruding upon you"

"Oh, no—oh, no!" Ada said quickly, coming forward shyly. "We shall be so glad! We are going to have tea, and——"

"Tea here? What a delightful idea!" said Shirley, as she held out her hand to Bessie, who stood a little apart, shy and blushing. "This is another of your sisters, Miss Grey? What lucky girls you are! I never had a sister."

"This is Bessie," said Lucie

"I have seen her at church marshaling a demure little party of school children," Shirley remarked, smiling. "Miss Bessie, I am very tired and thirsty. Will you bestow a cup of your tea on me?"

And then she sat down on one of the bowlders watching with gentle smiling eyes Bessie's primitive arrangements and looking so lovely in her delicate gray dress that Bessie declared afterward that she could have devoured her, "hat, dress, French boots, and all."

It was a pleasant little tea-party under the shadow of the cliff, with the sea glittering in the distance, for the tide was low and the sun wrapping it in a golden haze. The tea-pot was a black one, and its lid was minus a handle, and the cups were nursery mugs with grotesque pictures and rhymes upon them, and the bowlders did not make very comfortable seats; but the tea itself was strong and fragrant, the clotted cream an excellent substitute for milk, and Lady Glynn crowned Bessie's satisfaction by declaring that "bliss" was delicious and well merited the name she had given it. Then, when tea was over, it was quaint and pretty to see Bessie's pink fingers dipping the mugs into the little pools of sea water which the receding tide had left between the bowlders, and to hear her merry laughter echoing in the quiet solitude of the rocks and cliffs; and Shirley, sitting on one great flat bowlder, leaned her pretty head against a larger one, which served as a support, and felt the calm of the place and hour stealing over her.

The vicar's daughters were very pleasant companions; they were well read, and, although their education had been conducted on rather orthodox principles, it had been far more thorough than one obtained during a long sojourn at a fashionable boarding school. They were moreover thoroughly unaffected, and Shirley had had too few acquaintances in her brilliant fashionable career not to appreciate these new ones very highly, and to find much pleasure in their pleasant kindly chit-chat.

Before long even Bessie had entirely forgotten that Shirley was a great lady far above them in rank and position; she looked so sweet and gentle, and was so pleasant and thoughtful, and so interested in their home duties and occupations, and entered so thoroughly into Lucie's wish to travel and see lovely scenery and Ada's desire for change and variety, that they soon felt at home with her.

"You could hardly have lovelier scenery than this," she told them, gazing over the sea with a dreamy far-away look in her beautiful sad eyes. "I often think it is a pity to rush abroad when there is so much beauty at home."

"You have been a great deal abroad, Lady Glynn?"

"Yes, all my girlhood was spent abroad," see answered, in the low voice, with its pathetic little thrill, which Lucie thought so sweet. "I have a very sorrowful memory connected with the first night I spent in England. My dear mother died just at daybreak."

Lucie and Ada looked at her sympathetically and Lucie's mouth trembled a little What should they do if their mother were taken?

"Indeed almost all my happy memories are connected with sunny France," she went on, with a little wistful smile; "and it will always be the dearest country in the world to me."

"Do you know Scotland, Lady Glynn?"

"I have been there."

"The Highlands are lovely, are they not?" said Ada, not seeing the yearning pain which deepened in the sweet eyes.

"Yes."

"Do you like Scotland, Lady Glynn?"

"No."

The tone was very calm and quiet; but something indefinable, yet which all three girls felt, prevented any further questioning, and there was a little silence.

The evening was drawing on; but the season was summer in all its beauty and warmth, so that there was no chilliness in the air to cause any discomfort. Lucie however gently forced Shirley to submit to be wrapped in a soft scarlet knitted shawl which they had brought, and Lady Glynn smiled and thanked her softly; and when Lucie sat down by her side, she took the girl's hand and held it between her little fingers—such frail, slender, almost shadowy fingers they seemed as Lucy's firm hand closed over them caressingly

"We want only some music to make this perfect," Shirley said softly.

"Ada will sing us something," responded Lucie, smiling. "She is our nightingale, Lady Glynn. I should like you to hear her."

"I should like to hear her very much," Shirley said, in her pleasant kindly tones. "Please give me that pleasure, Miss Ada."

Ada flushed a little at the thought of singing before so critical an auditor as Lady Glynn would probably be; but she said, smiling, that the little she could do was not worth asking for twice, and she began to sing in a voice clear and sweet as a silver bell, and so true that its lack of cultivation was not noticeable. The rich notes rose, sounding clearly in the soft summer twilight, and reaching the ears of a tall man in a tweed travelling suit, who was coming swiftly and lightly down the cliff path, and who paused to listen, looking far away out at sea, as he stood midway between the sea and cliff brow, in a position which appeared perilous enough.

The Farmers' Inglenook.

An excellent mode of supplying supports for growing pea vines is to have two or three strands of cord running along the rows. It is cheaper than lath or pea sticks and can be more easily removed after pea harvest is ready.

The bright spring days will cause the young pigs to grow rapidly. Turn them on grass as soon as they are 10 weeks old, but gradually at first, or they may have the scours. It will cost but very little to raise a few pigs if they be given the privilege of a small grass plot and fed twice a day.

Plant beet, carrot and parsnip seed early, so as not only to get ahead of the grass, but to give plenty of time growth. The most important matter with such crops is to have a fine, rich, clean seed bed, and to use plenty of seed. The seed is slow in germinating, and often fails to sprout at all.

If a hen be properly fed she will continue to lay without desiring to incubate. She should not be allowed to become fat. The supposition that a hen lays a certain number of eggs, or a "clutch," or "litter," as it is sometimes called, is erroneous. If properly fed a hen will continue to lay until the period shall have arrived for her to molt.

When stock is turned on the pasture, and there left all day, the water supply must be looked after. A milch cow must have plenty of water. She cannot wait until she is driven up at night. The water is a necessary constituent of the milk, and she must have it during the time the milk is being manufactured If deprived of water during the warm days her supply of milk will fall off.

Fashion's Ways

Young ladies now wear their short cloth jackets unbottoned in the street on fine days, and have a single fresh flower thrust through a buttonhole of the front.

Narrow colored ribbons, with picot edges, are sewn flat, in rows, upon the figured challies now so much worn Narrow moire ribbons are used in the same manner to trim plain cashmeres

Nearly the most popular hat of the season is the turban, which is made of a big flat piece of straw that looks like pancake. It is plaited and drawn over a soft crown and encircled with a puff or roll velvet or silk. Loops are set high in front and a cluster of flowers is frequently added.

It is becoming more and more the custom for ladies to wear a very thin light-colored face veil to the theatre at night. By this means the front hair is kept in place, and the fair dame or damsel need have no anxiety about the adjustment of her "bangs" or crimps after she leaves her looking-glass.

A pretty dress for a boy of 4 is made of fine dark blue serge. The skirt is kilted, and half a dozen rows of white wool braiding card run straight around the bottom. There is a loose blouse waist of white surah and a little square-cut zouave jacket of the serge, trimmed with rows of braid to match the skirt. A big white cord, with knotted ends, is tied about the belt, and through it is thrust a long-stemmed rosebud or a bunch of daisies. A large leghorn or fine white straw "flat" is worn with this suit. It may be trimmed with a folded blue handkerchief and a twist of the big white cord.

Temperance Notes.

The largest brewery in Kansas was closed April 11th by order of the United States Marshal.

The anniversary of the W. C. T. U. of Tokio, Japan, was held recently, when two or three Japanese ladies gave excellent addresses to an audience of one thousand. An appeal was made for money with which to carry on the work, and it is stated that in a few minutes $200 was raised.

It is wonderful how the globe is being belted by the white ribbon. The World's W. C. T. U. was organized only four years ago, and already twenty-one different nations have joined this federation.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union, Auckland, N.Z., founded by Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, the round-the-world missionary of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, is in a flourishing condition. Too much cannot be said in praise of Mrs. Leavitt's work, which has been arduous in a very great degree, and wherever she has been the results have shown something solid to have been left behind. In every town where this good lady established a work it has prospered and grown.

Enough.

I will not ask my neighbor of his creed,
Nor what he deems of doctrine old or new;
Nor what rites his honest soul may need
To worship God—the only wise and true;
Nor what he thinks of the anointed Christ;
Nor with what baptism he has been baptized.

I ask not what temptations have beset
His humane heart, now self-debased and sore;
Nor by what wayside well the Lord he met;
Nor where was uttered, "Go and sin no more."
Between his soul and God that business lies;
Not mine to cavil, question or despise.

I ask not by which name among the rest
That Christians go by, he is named or known,
Whether his faith has ever been "professed"
Or whether proven by his deeds alone;
So there be Christhood in him all is well;
He is my brother, and in peace we dwell.

If grace and patience in his actions speak,
Or fall in words of kindness from his tongue,
Which raise the fallen, fortify the weak,
And heal the heart by sorrow rent and wrung,
If he give good for ill, and love for hate—
Friend of the friendless, poor and desolate—

I find in him discipleship so true,
So full, that nothing further I demand.
He may be bondman, freeman, Gentile, Jew,
But we are brothers—walk we hand in hand.
In his white life let me the Christhood see;
It is enough for him, enough for me.

Shelter Belts and Screens.

Now that the season for transplanting trees is on it may be well for owners of farms in regions liable to be swept by hard winds to note the advantages of providing shelter for their fields in the form of belts of timber trees. This protection, says the Country Gentleman, would be of great use where land has been reduced in value and its crops by stripping it entirely of the original forests. By setting the right kind of trees, valuable timber will be afforded in twenty years; and, by planting the belt two or three yards wide, one-half of the width may be cut at alternate periods, and thus always have a belt growing. We have seen several striking instances where such shelter has proved of great benefit, by increasing the growth of crops, and by preventing their destruction from the sweep of storms. They are also a benefit to the animals which graze such farms, and they would often add greatly to the picturesque appearance of the country. The tornadoes and wild blizzards which have swept many portions of the country the past winter have afforded an eloquent argument in favor of this protection. A few years ago a western town was nearly destroyed by a cyclone, with the exception of the few buildings which were amply protected by a grove of large trees. On these buildings the cyclone made little or no impression. It is well worth while for all towns and cities in regions liable to the sweep of such storms to provide on their windward sides ample belts or groves of dense and rapidly growing timber trees. They might prove worth many times their cost, to say nothing of the protection to human life which they would afford.

Dr. Talmage and His Guests.

A New York despatch says: Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, before delivering his sermon yesterday, made the following personal statement: "An infamous falsehood has gone into every city and neighborhood of this country and been discussed by hundreds of newspapers, the report saying that recently entertaining the officers of the 13th Regiment at my house I gave them four kinds of wine. There was not a drop of wine or any kind of intoxicating liquor, the twenty-five gentlemen then present being witnesses. I will give $1,000 reward to any one who will prove that one drop of wine was offered, or will give that amount to any charitable institution that may be named by any respectable clergyman, lawyer or detective, such person being the judge in the whole matter. That which I supposed was told as a joke is being used all over the land to give the impression that temperance men are hypocrites. I respectfully ask that the newspapers which have been misled by the report correct it."

The Hackman's Perplexity.

A cab was called recently to the door of a hotel in Princes street, Edinburgh, at a very late hour. Three gents were helped out of the hotel into the cab, all pretty much the worse of liquor. Boots explained to cabby that the one sitting on the front seat was to be set down at No. so and so in such and such a street; the one on the off side on the other seat was to be set down in another street, and the third was to be set down at another given address. Away the cabby drove, but in a short time the hotel bell was rung again, and on Boots opening the door he discovered the same cabman standing in a state of great perplexity. "These three gents," he explained, "you gave me have all tumbled down in the bottom of the cab and got mixed and I want you to come out and put a ticket on them for me."

Southern Strawberries.

The strawberry shipping season is now in full activity in Florida; probably 800 bushels left Lawley station, Bradford County, last week for various northern cities. We had frosts as late as March 24th, which destroyed a good deal of bloom, and the yield has been much reduced besides by the rust, a disease whose causes are not yet well understood. The diminished yield and the increasing warmth in the North have given an upward tendency to prices: 45c to 55c a quart is our last quotation from Philadelphia, and 50c to 60c from New York. Two weeks ago 30c was about the average price. Your correspondent shipped his first bushel of early Ohio potatoes this season, April 4th. Orange trees have not bloomed yet in this section of the State, and it is believed that we are to have an "off year." So many late frosts also reduced the amount of bloom on the pear and peach trees, although enough were left to produce an average crop. Peento peaches are now about as large as hulled walnuts.

A Shipwreck Likely.

Goslin—"Yes, Miss Smith, I expect to sail for Europe."

Miss Smith (innocently)—"Indeed. What on?"

Goslin (embarrassed)—"Well, er—to tell you the truth, Miss Smith, it's on borrowed money."

A little boy named Hammer, living in Bellaire, O., ate twelve hard boiled eggs on Easter Sunday, and a few days ago he was buried. Jim Jordan, a young darkey in John H. Keith's employ, at Griffin, Ga., ate twenty-four bananas at a sitting last week, but so far as heard from is still alive.

PUMPING A LAKE DRY.

How a Scotchman is Reclaiming a Vast Area of Submerged Land in Egypt.

Mr. Grant went on to say that he was going back to Egypt to finish the reclamation of Lake Abukir.

"What, Lake Abukir? That lies to the northeast of the Mahmudieh Canal, of which we heard so much during the year 1883?"

"That is the lake. It lies on one side of the railway and canal; Lake Mareotis lies on the other."

"Just so. Every one remembers it from the maps published during the time when our ironclad train was skirmishing in front of Arabi's lines before Alexandria. But what are you going to do to the lake?"

"Pump it into the sea!"

"Whew—that is a large order! Why, it is miles and miles across."

"Thirty-one thousand acres in exact figures. But we are pumping it dry. We began on March 8th with a pair of Gwynne's pumps, and at the rate they are going at it they will empty the lake in a month. Just think! These pumps lift 460 tons of water 6 feet 8 inches high every minute. We burn 6 cwt. of coal per hour, so that we lift out of the lake into the sea nearly 90,000 tons of water for every ton of coal we burn. In twenty-four hours we lift over 600,000 tons of water."

"Why are you emptying the lake?"

"Because it ought not to be a lake. If Egypt had been in English hands fifty years ago it would have been dry ground long since. Once it was not a lake, but where the water now stands was found some of the richest soil in Egypt. The land lies below the sea-level, and a great storm nearly 300 years ago swept the salt waters of the Mediterranean over this flat suburban land. Our troops in 1801 made things worse by cutting the embankment. The land became saline and useless. In winter it fills; in summer it dries up. But the salt curses the land, and until it can be got out nothing can be done."

"How can you get the salt out of the land?"

"By putting it in steep. If the lake could be pumped dry when it is full in winter the water would carry off the salt, for water standing in salty land sucks up the salt as if it were a sponge. Instead of being pumped off, it has evaporated, and the salt has been regularly redeposited, with the result that the land has laid barren. Now we expect that after the pumps empty the lake it will only need another drenching to clear off all the saline matter."

"How will you drench it?"

"As soon as the water is off the land we shall canalize and drain the area formerly under water. Then at next high Nile we shall flood it from the Mahmudieh Canal. After allowing it to stand in steep for a few weeks we shall pump it off again, and then we shall have ready for settlement 31,000 acres of the richest soil in Egypt, close to the great city of Alexandria, and capable of bearing a rent of £10 an acre."

"What do you reckon the value of the estate which you have thus created?"

"Last year, before we began work, it was worth nothing. We have spent and shall spend £50,000 on its reclamation. I reckon it will then be worth a clear million sterling. By the terms of my concession the Egyptian Government refrains from levying full land tax for a term of years. Altogether, the enterprise has been a most successful one from every point of view."—Pall Mall Gazette.

How Snuff is Made.

In the manufacture of snuff in this country the finest Virginia leaf tobacco is used which is considerably modified by carrying the fermentation much further than in tobacco intended for smoking, and is simply ground and sifted.

"In our factory," said a prominent dealer, "we have about sixty mills, resembling large coffee mills. The ground tobacco falls upon an endless band of broad canvas, which conveys it to four sets of mechanical sieves. The snuff which passes through is received upon an endless travelling band, which carries it thence into a close chest. The particles which are too coarse to pass through the sieve are reground. The immense varieties of snuffs are formed by mixing together and grinding tobaccos of different growths, and by varying the nature of the same.

"For the snuff known as Nearco, forty parts of genuine St. Omer, South American, tobacco, forty parts of George and twenty parts of fermented Virginia stalks in powder are used. The whole is ground and sifted. Then two and one-half pounds of rose leaves are mixed with powdered Virginian stalks, and two and one-half pounds of rosewood in fine powder, moistened with salt water, are added. It is then worked up with one pound of cream of tartar, two pounds of salt of tartar and four pounds of table salt. This snuff, which is highly scented, must be preserved in lead and brings $4 per pound. The other brands of snuff manufactured here are Bolongaro, large grained Parish and Scotch snuff, ranging in price from $3 to $10 per pound.—Mail and Express.

Rather Eccentric.

A shocking discovery was made the other day at Morland, a village near Penrith. During the night a lady named Miss Jane Leadsome loaded a gun and proceeded to an outhouse. Having rested the gun on a box, she placed herself before it, and pulled the tricker with a stick. The top of her head was blown off. Her body was discovered in the morning lying over a bucket. She was an accomplished, but eccentric, lady, mildly comments the London Standard.

Erect and Soldierly.

—General Booth, of the Salvation Army, whose daughter was married the other day in London, sold 7,000 tickets to the wedding at $5 apiece.

Clarence Thompson, a young lad in Findlay, O., found a bird's nest on the railroad bridge, and, on examining it, discovered in place of eggs a silk handkerchief in which three dozen solid gold rings were wrapped up. They were evidently some thief's booty.

Russia is blessed with the highest "protective tariff" of all Europe, and yet labor is starved, the money of the country is worth only 50 per cent. of its face value, and the Czar cannot borrow a penny anywhere, so poor is his credit.

The Chinese colony in Chicago consists of 2,000 souls, of whom only two are women. About 100 of them are merchants, several of whom have fortunes of from $100,000 to $200,000. Four firms, dealing in tea, coffee and Chinese groceries, have an aggregate capital of $500,000.

Pope Leo dines at 1 o'clock, after the Roman fashion. His dinner is always simple, consisting of soup, with macaroni, a course of roast meat, with gravy and fried potatoes or one other vegetable. There is some fruit for dessert, and perhaps a glass of old Bordeaux afterwards. He never eats boiled meat or pork in any form, or cheese.

An English seer—Baxter is his name, we could bet—has discovered that the numerical value of the letters of the name "Boulanger" in Greek is just 666, and prophesies that the melodramatic general is to play a leading part in affairs between this time and the second advent of Christ, which is to occur at 3 o clock in the afternoon of March 5th, 1896.

Of 600 tornadoes of which record has been made in the United States, not more than 75 were east of the Allegheny Mountains. The warm air tempestuously driven up the Mississippi Valley is caught by the polar winds and driven in gyratory tornadoes across the prairies. The Appalachian range serves on the Atlantic slope as a barrier against storms of that sort.

There is an alarming scarcity of water in many of the large towns of Great Britain, and Liverpool and Manchester are threatened with a water famine. In view of this state of things it is proposed to bring sea water in pipes from the coast to the inland towns, the sea water to be used for baths, closets, watering streets, flushing sewers and extinguishing fires. The scheme meets with much favor.

Thomas Nast told a San Francisco reporter that when he was in Bismarck, D.T., it was so cold he could not give his illustrated lecture, for the paints froze stiff, and the spectators were in a fair way to do the same. In Tacoma the manager of the Alpha Hall wouldn't permit Mr. Nast to lecture because there was an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" Company in town, and the manager didn't think two performances at a time were just the thing.

The great panorama, "Niagara in London," has proved an immense success in the British metropolis. The enterprising proprietors, six of whom, it is said, planked down £5,000 each to carry out Mr. John Hollingshead's experiment, are beginning to find themselves recouped. They are certainly so far encouraged that Paris and Berlin are also to have their "Niagara." Mr. Philip Porteaux has been engaged at stupendous fees to paint duplicates for these two cities. What has added to its popularity is the recent visit of Mr. Gladstone.

For the first time in the world's history a Mr. Confucius has within the last few days arrived in London. Just 2,419 years ago the wife of "the ancient teacher, the illustrious and accomplished, the all-complete and perfect sage," presented him with a son and heir. In recognition of this auspicious event, the reigning duke sent the sage a present of a brace of carp, and, to mark his sense of the favor thus shown him, he named the infant Li—i.e., "carp." The gentleman who has now arrived in London is of the 71st generation in direct male descent from Mr. "Carp" Confucius, and he furnishes an illustrious instance of hereditary genius. He is a member of the Hanlin College, admission to which is granted only to a small proportion of those scholars who pass the highest competitive examination in the Empire.

Again Those Busy Hens.

A short time ago the conundrum was asked in print if a hen and a half lays an egg and a half in a day and a half, how many eggs will six hens lay in seven days? The Rev. Mrs. Crossley submitted the conundrum to a young lad in Long Ridge, Stamford, and he sends her the following answer:

Dear Mrs. Crossley,—I have not seen you in a day and a half, but I have got the answer to that puzzle and a half about the hen and a half that layed the egg and a half in a day and a half. I have really earned a dollar and a half, for I have worn out a pencil and a half, and covered a slate and a half to get the answer, which is thirty-one and one-half eggs. If you own that hen and a half that layed the egg and a half in a day and a half, do in my behalf kill her and send me half.

It is now six and a half and I have got an hour and a half to finish this side and a half about the hen and a half that layed the egg and a half in a day and a half.

It seems very queer to me that a lady who had taught school before the war cannot get the answer to such a simple puzzle. If you have any more of the same sort send them along (if this is right).

ANIMALS HAVE LANGUAGE.

Monkeys Called Together in Convention and Addressed by a Long-Tailed Patriarch.

The intellectual superiority of civilized man over his savage brethren is due to the greater multiplicity of his objects of thought, says the Gentlemen's Magazine; and precisely so is it with the intellectual superiority of the savage man over his simian ancestors. The actions of all have the same aim, viz., the supplying of the wants of physical nature and the gratifying of the desires aroused in the mind. The old theory that speech was altogether limited to the human race has now to be given up once and for all, for such a statement cannot stand against the scientific evidence brought forward to oppose it from all quarters.

Language is but a product of reflection and experience, and originated, in all probability, in interjection or the instinctive expression of the subjective impressions derived from external nature; and just as the reflective powers of the race were developed and shown more brilliantly as each stage in the evolutionary march of intellect was passed, so did language pass from the simple monosyllabic cries of the lower animals and savage men to the complex dialects of modern civilization; and it is worthy of note that at the present day, or at least very recently, there were races of savage men inhabiting the earth who possessed no proper language at all, and could not, on account of their manner of living, be placed on a higher intellectual level than the higher apes; while we have the authority of the leading philologists of the day in support of the fact that the monosyllabic cries of some of the lower human tribes are well within the grasp of the ape's voice.

Travellers whose veracity and ability cannot be impugned have described long conferences held by monkeys, where one individual addressed the assembly at great length, fixing the attention of all upon himself and quelling every disturbance by a loud and harsh cry, which was at once recognized and obeyed by the multitude, and we need no traveller to point out to us the many notes of call and recognition possessed by birds of all kinds, who thoroughly understand each other's expressions, and, moreover, are able to produce quite a string of different notes consecutively and without any hesitation. In fact, the organ of voice in some of the lower animals far exceeds in power that of some tribes of the human family.

The Euphonia musica of the East Indies can perform the seven notes in the scale; the chaffinch not only sings real songs, but invents them, one of his songs containing as many as five long strophes, while the songs of many savage races of men never run to half that length, and when Cook visited the Fiji archipelago the native women could only sing from la to mi. Asia appears to have been the birthplace of stringed instruments, no southern tribes ever having been discovered using such musical appliances. We see, therefore, a gradual improvement taking place in vocal apparatus as we rise in the animal scale, which results in speech and song, and, indirectly, in instrumental music of various degrees; and we find fresh proof that there is as wide a difference between the development of civilized European and the savage man as between that of the savage man and his brute ancestry.

Alligators as Millinery.

We have seen birds, frogs, kittens, rabbits and puppies heads, to say nothing of all the flowers there are, all the kinds of feathers ever worn by any kind of bird, and fruits as well as grain and grass, and all the vegetables, from tiny cucumbers to carrots and cabbages, so that now it would almost seem as if there were nothing else in the world that could be utilized as a new garniture for hats and bonnets, and yet there is a new style of trimming which has already captured the female heart, and that is baby alligators.

The young alligators which are used for this style of trimming are from six to ten inches long and must be the real thing, stuffed and with bright glass eyes and arranged so as to appear to be crawling up the front trimmings of ribbon bows.—Schenectady Star.

Fashion's Taste in Tints.

That was a queer lot of greens and heliotropes that fashion made popular last year; but this year's colors beat 1887 out of sight. The names of a few may give some faint idea of their respective characters. M. Worth announces that the following will be the tints most in vogue: In green we are to have "diseased ghost," "weary watermelon" and "retired cheese." "Spoiled moon" will also be considered very chic. Among the mauves and heliotropes "forgotten lobster" is to be the favorite, although "faded apoplexy" will please many. The rouge to be worn with the new shades should be qualified with a touch of purple.—Puck.

A Long Run.

The Durham Review says: A son of Robert Haw, of Egremont, went a week or two ago to Port Hope, driving all the way and taking a hound with him. When near Port Hope the dog was missed and a letter sent to his father in Egremont about the dog being lost. The dog arrived in Egremont as soon as the letter, having run 150 miles, the time both ways being about six days.

Pulpit Advertising.

Rev. Mr. Learoyd, in the Bridge Street Church, Belleville, after reading some half dozen notices on Sunday last, said: "Brethren, I think I have read announcements enough. I shall be glad of the time when they will send announcements like these to the papers instead of the pulpit to waste time. That's what newspapers are for."

A SIX-YEAR BRIDAL TRIP.

Novel Matrimonial Experiences of Mr. and Mrs. Sigourney.

George Sigourney married Miss Imogene Henriques in Buffalo in 1882. Mr. Sigourney is the son of a wealthy Californian, while Miss Henriques' parents, though not poor, were in only comfortable circumstances, and lived in a small town near Buffalo. What led to the attachment I do not know, but it is said it was a case of love at first sight, with a speedy marriage. The cards read after marriage: "Mr. and Mrs. Sigourney. At home Thursdays, in Sacramento, California, beginning May 10th, in the year 1888." From 1882 to 1888 is a long time to catch them "at home," but they have been upon one perpetual bridal trip for six years, arriving in New York last Monday.

Five days after their marriage they were on the high seas, bound for England. They had plenty of money, and planned a six years' trip with [illegible] and pretty wife. When they [illegible] London both wrote home to their [illegible]s that they would not be back for six [illegible] and Mr Sigourney made arrangements with his banker to forward their mail wherever they might be. After going through England, Ireland and Scotland they fairly covered every point of interest in France, Germany, Italy, Prussia, Austria and Russia. They visited Greece, Denmark, Rome, Turkey, China, Japan, sailed along the Nile, visited the Canary Islands, Borneo, New Guinea, Persia, and spent a year in travelling through Asia.

They went to Australia, and from there to Africa, and thence over to South America. Commencing at Patagonia, they travelled north, visiting all the principal places in Peru, Chili, Bolivia, Brazil, Argentine Republic and the other countries of South America, and re-crossing the Pacific Ocean again took up their journey to England by another route. While abroad Mrs. Sigourney became the mother of twin boys and two girls. The twins were born at St. Petersburg, Russia, one of the girls in China and the last child in Brazil. * * * Bismarck told them there was only one place in America he would like to see, and that was Niagara Falls. Mr. Sigourney told me it was impossible to even estimate the number of miles he had travelled. When I asked him how much it had cost him he said: "Somewhere in the neighborhood of $75,000," as unconcerned as if it had been 75 cents. When he married his wife, in 1882, she weighed but 102 pounds; now she weighs 165. Both are darkly bronzed in face from their long journeyings in hot countries abroad, but are healthy, and, as Mrs. Sigourney said archly: "We ran up to Albany this week to see your capitol, leaving the babies at our hotel in New York in care of a Russian nurse, who manages the twins, while the Brazilian nurse looks after the girl born in her country and the girl born in China." On Saturday they left for their home in Sacramento, taking with them the aged father and mother of Mrs. Sigourney to see the parents of her husband.—Albany N. Y. Journal.

An Impromptu Didactic.

Mrs. Ashton Dilke (the distinguished English advocate of female suffrage) and her friends dislike very much to have that lady's dress described in the reports of her public speeches. They say the papers never take the trouble to tell how a male political speaker is clothed and they do not see why women should not be entitled to the same painless omission.

Touching this matter it is related that a young reporter who attended the meeting at the First Methodist Church last Wednesday night approached one of Mrs. Dilke's friends, a lady not unknown to fame, and said:

"We men, you know, are green about such things. Will you please tell me whether that dress of Mrs. Ashton Dilkey's is silk or not?"

The lady bit her lip a little, and then, after a moment, took the reporter's pencil and pad and wrote:

Whether her gown be really silk
Or only something silky,
Her name is Mrs. Ashton Dilke,
Not Mrs. Ashton Dilkey.

She then dismissed the young man as only a woman can dismiss a fresh young man and he has been eating salt ever since to thaw himself out.—Chicago Times.

Breach of Promise.

A breach of promise case was tried at the Cobourg Assizes on Tuesday and Wednesday. The plaintiff was Miss Ada Riordan, a school teacher of Toronto, who sued a young farmer named Galbraith for breach of promise of marriage made on the 25th of October, 1884. The evidence was of the usual character, a whole stack of sentimental love letters being presented in court to prove the case. Wednesday afternoon the jury brought in a verdict of $1,250 for the plaintiff.

Among other indications of German feeling cables the Berlin correspondent of the New York Herald, comes a renewed bitter agitation against the use of foreign words, no matter how long or how thoroughly they have been assimilated to the German language. Laws are being strongly pressed which would exclude all words not of strictly German origin from official use. For table use French is to be entirely superseded—at least so say the Prince Regent of Bavaria, Prince Reuss, the Crown Prince of Saxony and a large following of royalty and commonality. Among other changes now gloated over by the German purists are erfrischungshaus for restaurant, gasthoftafel for table d'hote, mittelrippenstuck for entrecote, gesprungene kartoffeln for pommes sautees, and karthauserschnapps for chartreuse.

OUR ROLLER MILL.

Look here, people of Flesherton and district surrounding! we want to have a quiet little chat with you. Didn't many of you clamor loudly for a good roller mill a few years ago? You did. Alright; we'll pop another question or two to you. Havn't you got your "clamor" satisfied? Is there not now one of the most complete roller plants in the Flesherton mill to be found in the County? Do you patronize home as you said you would if the needed facilities were added to our mill for the manufacture of roller flour? A lot of money has been invested in order to furnish you with this popular brand of flour at your very doors, and yet some of you have gone back on your record by continuing to patronize outsiders. Has it occurred to you that this money, if spent at home, would be a benefit to yourself as well as to the community in general? If you spend your money elsewhere, how much of it will come back into your hands again? Spend it at home and it will circulate in your immediate vicinity, benefitting scores of people, yourself included. Just think this over calmly and then act upon the honest dictates of your own conscience. It will do you good. It will also do everybody else good. Think about it, and above all, don't be a clam!

"BLUE RUIN" PREACHERS.

A few days ago two gentlemen were driving through Flesherton. The elder man of the two had never been in the place before, and he spoke with considerable enthusiasm of the beautiful location, the handsome churches and public buildings, etc. Finally he said to his young companion:—

"What is the name of this place?"

"Flesherton," replied the young man.

"What! you don't mean to tell me that this beautiful, thrifty looking place is Flesherton? Surely you are joking."

"No joke at all, sir; this is really and truly Flesherton," said the other with a smile.

"Is it possible! Why, I met a man who said he lived here, and he told me the place was going to the dogs! It is really too bad that any man, much less a resident, should speak in such dismal strains of a lovely place like this."

"My dear sir," said the young man, "you had the misfortune of coming in contact with a "blue ruin" specimen of humanity—one of those growling, snarling, discontented specimens to be met with in every community."

Thus it is. Man's worst enemy is usually his own evil nature; and the worst enemies any place has to contend with are the "blue ruin" preachers to be found within its own borders! If ever injury was inflicted upon Flesherton in the past, you can trace it straight to the "blue ruin" men. Let the sun of prosperity shine ever so brightly, these worthies never fail to discover clouds and darkness and ruin and weeping and gnashing of teeth generally. And yet they are content to spend their lives in the very place they abuse so absurdly and inconsistently! What a magnificent piece of satire upon the folly of the apostles of "blue ruin" is this!

Flesherton is convenient of access to the best railway system in America. She is surrounded by a fine agricultural country, has splendid gravel roads leading thereto from all quarters and possesses superior natural facilities. A straight level road to the C.P.R. depot, a sidewalk to the same place and improvements on the Valley Road will be forthcoming in due time. What more could we want! It requires but little prescience to predict a prosperous future. Even the apostles of "blue ruin" will be silenced in the near future, when they perceive all their gloomy forebodings dispelled. Stand solidly by home and home enterprise, talk up your own town and the future will be brighter even than the past—and that has been most encouraging.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

There has been a very large demand for advertising space in THE ADVANCE during the present year. So much so, that we have been obliged to refuse quite a number of profitable advertising contracts. We don't like to refuse anything there is money in, so we have made arrangements whereby we will be enabled to take on any number of "ads" in future and yet furnish our subscribers with the usual quota of reading matter. Last week our advertisers almost took full possession of the ADVANCE, driving the Editor, so to speak, into a pretty small corner. At the same time, we had such a tremendous rush of job work, that we could not find time to issue a supplement. It goes without saying that THE ADVANCE is a superior advertising medium and the public know it is, too.

"Hard-to-Roll" wrote a letter to the Editor of the Dundalk Herald last week, relative to the notorious "Badgeros eviction" referred to in our "County and District News." He defends the ruffianly conduct of the evicters and says they acted upon a lawyer's advice! In the name of an honorable profession, we ask "Hard-to-Roll" to make public the name of that lawyer. The whole affair savors of the dark ages. The very fact that "Hard-to-Roll" dare not sign his own name to his communication shows that he does not put much faith in the legality of his so-called "lawyer's advice. There is no code of honor that compels an editor to keep back the name of an anonymous contributor, who is in such open sympathy with lawlessness as is this "Hard-to-Roll" chap. And we venture the opinion that it is in the interests of the respectable and law-abiding public to hand in the name of the defender of terrorism and give him a taste of British justice.

How the Bottle got Broken.

To the Editor of The Advance

Last week two men went out to Flesherton on general business. The one is in the employ of Her Majesty and carries a great leather bag in his rig, makes daily trips to Flesherton and Epping, and is peculiarly fond of cracking jokes. The other keeps his source of income in a few barrels in his cellar and a number of bottles behind the counter. Having transacted their business in the village and indulged the Bacchanalian propensities to a little beyond moderation, and the latter having procured ample supply in a jug unknown to the former, they started for home. Having proceeded some distance the man of the leather bag became thirsty and proposed to his friend that they see what was in the parcel—for his sense of smell being very acute, especially for old Bacchus—he had discovered the jug and he longed to taste its contents. This agreeing with what the appetite of the latter suggested, consented and the jug was tapped accordingly. The man of the leather bag was about to regale himself on the cup that "cheers" but alas! there is many a slip between the jug and the lip, and so it proved on this occasion. Whether it was because he was light in the head and the starch considerably out of him, or the jug too heavy, I am not prepared to say. Anyhow the jug escaped his grasp and fell on the wheel, breaking its neck and spilling its precious contents in the road! Well, I need not try to describe the look of disappointment that clouded both faces, nor tell what they said, but you cannot find the expression in the New Testament.

This, I think, is the crowning joke among the many on the man of the leather bag.

Correspondence of The Advance.

[The following interesting items were received after we went to press last week. —ED.]

Mr. Geo. Graham has put a new saw in his mill, which is giving good satisfaction. He has a complete set of hands and is turning out considerable work.

Mr. Boland is here superintending the cutting of about one hundred thousand feet of lumber for shipping.

Mr. Ed. Fawcett is here with a gang of men running logs down the river for Mr. Tyson, of Clarksburg.

Mr. James Magee is the happy father of twins—boy and girl.

Mr. Hammond's youngest child died on Friday morning. Quite a number followed the remains to Fairmount cemetery on Sunday. Mr. and Mrs. Hammond have our sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

About two weeks ago Mr. Henry Ellis was kicked in the face by a horse which broke his jaw bone and knocked out a tooth. It was thought that he was progressing favorably until a few days since, when erysipelas set in which seemed to indicate serious results. We are pleased to learn again, however, that he is now out of danger.

While Mr. G. L. Thompson was doing some repairing he had the misfortune to let a large piece of scantling fall in his face inflicting a serious wound.

Miss A. Thurston, of Stayner, paid our village a flying visit—coming on Saturday and returning on Monday.

Miss Jennie Graham has returned home after a four months visit among friends in Orangeville.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

"Just in Time."

This pure bred Clydesdale Stallion is the property of Mr. Andrew Beattie, an enterprising Artemesia farmer. "Just in Time" is a good representative of his class and, like Mr. R. Paton's "Baron," has created much interest wherever exhibited. The following letters from the Judges at Maxwell and Flesherton spring shows explain themselves:

Maxwell, April 24th, 1888.

We, the undersigned, Judges at Maxwell Spring Show, have awarded Mr. Shaw's horse, "Lord Gordon," 1st prize owing to the wording of the bill placed in our hands. Had it not been for the wording of the bill, Mr. Beattie's horse, "Just in Time," would have been awarded 1st prize at once.

RICHARD Y. BURKE,
JOHN DUNCAN,
A. G. SUTHERLAND.

Flesherton, April 26th, 1888.

We, the undersigned, Judges of the above (Flesherton) show, do highly recommend the horse, "Just in Time," owned by Andrew Beatty, of the Township of Artemesia, in the County of Grey, and consider the horse worthy of the prize had there been a class to show him in.

"Young Leabond."

This stallion, the property of Mr. John J. Magee, Artemesia, has been travelled in this section for a number of years and has acquired an excellent reputation amongst a large section of stock-raisers. He will make the season of 1888 as follows:

Monday will leave his own stable, Lot 17, Con. 11, Artemesia, and proceed to Leonard Bett's for noon, thence by way of gravel road to John Kerton's for night.

Tuesday will proceed to Hudson's in Osprey, for noon, thence by way of town to John Linley's, 12th line, for night.

Wednesday proceed to F. Thompson's for noon, thence to Kimberley for night.

Thursday proceed by 7th line to Hicks' for noon, thence by way of 60th side road to 11th line, Euphrasia, to Fred. Taylor's for night.

Friday will proceed by way of 60th side road and town line to Holland Centre for noon, thence by way of gravel road to Allen's hotel, Berkeley, for night.

Saturday will proceed by way of back line to Marsh's hotel, Markdale, for noon, thence by way of town line and Vandeleur home to his own stable where he will remain until Monday morning, when the above route will be repeated—continuing throughout the season, health and weather permitting.

"Young Nugent."

This representative of the graceful and elegant Percheron class of stallions is the property of Mr. Arthur Johnston, of Artemesia, and has already attracted a great deal of attention. He will make the season of 1888 as follows:—

Thursday will leave his own stable, lot 20, Con. 11, Artemesia, and proceed by way of Little Mill to Samuel Badgerow's.

Friday will proceed down Fourth Line two miles and a half in Osprey, across to Maxwell for noon, thence across to 8th to James Magee's for night.

Saturday will proceed to Eugenia for noon, thence across Valley by Campbell's and Vandeleur to his own stable.

Monday wil go by way of Wm. Hill's across up back line to Foster's Corner, thence by gravel road to Marsh's Hotel, Markdale, for noon, thence along town line by Sewell's corner and home.

Above route will be continued during the season, health and weather permitting

"Lucky Lad."

This Heavy Draught stallion, the property of Mr. Andrew Beatty, Artemesia, is well spoken of in various quarters, and will make the season of 1888 as follows:

Monday will leave his own stable, Lot 129, 1st West T. & S. R., Artemesia, and proceed by 30th side road to Wm. Hutchinson's, Vandeleur, for noon, thence to Wm. Cameron's, 8th line, for night.

Tuesday by 8th line, Osprey, to R. McGirr's hotel, Feversham, for noon, thence to McIntyre for night.

Wednesday by 3rd line to J. Winter's for noon, thence by Wareham to T. Taylor's for night.

Thursday by D. McMullan's to J. Parker's, 2nd West T. & S. R., Artemesia, for noon, thence to D. McMillan's, Lot 10, Con. 3, South, for night.

Friday to Arch. McCuaig's, Lot 28 Con. 2 S.D.R., Glenelg, for noon, thence to J. Beaton's, Lot 25, Con. 3 N. D. R., Glenelg, for night.

Saturday by 2nd Con. to G. Pattersons, town line for noon, thence by Snell's corner to his own stable.

Above route will be continued during season, health and weather permitting.

Bulls.

"Valley Chief" is the name of a fine thorough-bred Short Horn Bull owned by the noted stock-raiser and agriculturist, Mr. James Stewart, of Kimberley. This splendid animal has taken first prizes wherever exhibited, and will stand for service at Mr. Stewart's Euphrasia farm, near Kimberley.

Mr. Isaac Sinclair, of Artemesia, possesses a grade Durham Bull, which will stand for service this season.

Temperance.

"It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak."—Rom. 14c. 21v.

The Huron Expositor says:—A general prohibitory law, framed by the Dominion Government and enforced by them, would be respected and observed if a majority of the people declared in favor of it. Let the people have a chance to speak. Place the square issue before them and if they do not declare in favor of it the signs of the times have no meaning. A law of this kind, sanctioned by the people and enforced by the Government, would be observed.

In the spring, hundreds of persons suffer from boils, carbuncles, and other eruptive diseases. These are evidences that the system is trying to purge itself of impurities and that it needs the powerful aid which is afforded by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass.,

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:

My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

SIX HUNDRED HORSESHOES A MINUTE.

An Inventor Claims That He Can Turn Out That Number in That Time.

A Troy, N. Y., despatch says: Edwin Firth, of this place, returned last week from Washington, where he had been to make application for a patent on a horse-shoe-making machine of his invention. The idea of most of the present machines is this: The passing of a bar of heated iron back and forth through the machine, dropping off into horseshoes; that is, the horseshoes are made one at a time. By Mr. Firth's plan, it is claimed, forty, fifty, or even sixty horseshoes can be made at the same time, it taking just four seconds to make one horseshoe or forty horseshoes. The machine consists of sections, each section making a shoe and as many sections as needed may be used. The process in brief is as follows: A bar or bloom of iron heated to a plastic heat in the usual manner is passed through the rolls just as in the old process. It is then placed in the machine and cut into pieces by saws placed between the sections, which can be regulated so that horseshoes of any desired size can be made. By other motions of the machine the short pieces of iron are bent, punched and swaged. In the old process the shoes are punched and swaged after being bent in the machine, thus making three distinct processes. By Mr. Firth's contrivance all three processes are performed by the same machine. Mr. Firth has nine patents already on file, and has invented more than one hundred contrivances within the past twenty-four months. Among other inventions is that of a cannon which it is claimed will drive a ball with the precision of a rifled gun, but much farther.

BAD RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

Serious Disaster to a Passenger Train Near Olean, New York—A Score of People Badly Injured—Several Deaths Probable.

A last (Saturday) night's Olean, N. Y., despatch says: This morning the passenger train on the Western New York & Pennsylvania Railroad, running between Emporium and Buffalo, was wrecked near Whitehouse, ten miles east of this city. A relief train carrying physicians and the ambulance corps of the 43rd separate company was at once sent to the scene from here. The wrecked train consisted of the engine, mail and baggage car, and three coaches. The mail and baggage cars and two coaches, one the smoker, were thrown from the track and rolled down an embankment into a ditch containing several feet of water. The cause of the accident was the spreading of the rails. The cars were but slightly damaged, although the train was running thirty miles an hour when the accident occurred. The track was torn up for many feet. It is a miracle that no one was killed instantly, as the cars which rolled down the twenty foot bank contained nearly forty passengers.

The injured are Captain C. G. Thyng, Olean, badly bruised and injured internally; J. J. Smith, Bath, badly cut and spine injured, recovery doubtful; Mrs. O. W. Wheaton, Alleghany, injured internally, recovery doubtful; Mrs. Goodsell, Condersport, Pa., internal injuries and head cut, may not recover; George Stevens, South Wales, arm broken; Kate Smith, Port Alleghany, Pa., head and back injured seriously; Ella Adams, Duke Centre, Pa., head and side badly cut and bruised; Mary Dorick, Smithport, Pa., injured on head and side; Mrs. B. Hutchinson, Eugene Dean and D. McGinnis, of this city, were slightly injured.

MORE ABOUT THE NORTHWEST.

The Vast Metalliferous Districts of the Dominion—A Fine Pastoral Area.

An Ottawa despatch says: Dr. Dawson, of the Geological Survey, gave an elaborate batch of evidence before Senator Schultz's Mackenzie River Committee this morning. Some of the doctor's points that were not brought out by other witnesses were that the metalliferous districts of British North America on the west coast, including the upper waters of the Laird and Peace Rivers, are at least 1,800 miles long and average 500 miles broad, and that this area is greater than the metalliferous area of the whole of the United States.

On the plateau of the upper waters of the Yukon and the upper waters of the Laird River there exists a fine pastoral area of great extent where the growth of the hardy cereals could always be depended upon. The district in the valley of the Dwina River in Northern Russia, which flows into the White Sea at Archangel in latitude 65°, supported a large population. The Mackenzie River district seemed equally well adapted for a large population. If it should be found that shipments could be made from the mouth of the Mackenzie as they are made from the mouth of the Dwina it would become a very valuable country.

Brave Mollie Green.

A Nashville, Tenn., despatch says: A mad dog ran into the school-house at Cypress Creek yesterday and made toward one of the children. Miss Mollie Green, the teacher, sprang between the dog and the child. She kicked at the animal, her skirts protecting her, and by the aid of a heavy ruler kept it at bay until all the children had fled. The infuriated animal repeatedly sprang at her throat, but she was agile and resolutely stood her ground. When all the little ones were gone she desperately fought off the dog until she reached the door, which she pulled to after her and fell fainting outside. The children ran to the nearest houses and gave the alarm. Two men soon came and killed the dog which had been terrorizing the neighborhood for two days. The parents of the children gave the young woman a fine horse as a present. Her clothes were torn to ribbons during the encounter.

A WINDSOR ROMANCE.

In Which a Former Hamiltonian is Mixed Up.

A despatch from Windsor says: Francis Riley is a well known character of Windsor and Petite Cote. He formerly ran a steamboat on the Mississippi River and during the war amassed a fortune. Sarah Rogers, an Irish girl, came to this country in 1846, and after marrying George Edward Hume located in Hamilton, Ont., where Harry D. Hume was born 41 years ago. Mrs. Hume went out to work in a hotel, and there made the acquaintance of an engineer's family named Sadler. They took a fancy to baby Harry and wanted to adopt him. Mrs. Hume allowed the child to accompany them, and then lost sight of the Sadlers and the Sadlers of her. When the lad grew up he undertook to find his mother. He found that her husband had been killed in an accident, and she had married Francis Riley, a widower. Harry Sadler, as he is called, has been for twenty years on the New York Herald. From the time of first meeting his mother in 1870 till last June, the two corresponded regularly, when the mother ceased to write. A week ago he was shocked to learn from the Herald's news column that Mrs. Riley, his mother, had been dead three months, and that Riley was a defendant in the Probate Court here in an action instituted by his daughter, Mrs. Sullivan, to have a guardian appointed to take charge of his property. As Mrs. Riley had some property and Mr. Sadler had not been notified of his mother's death, he wrote a lawyer here and learned that a year ago Riley sold thirty acres of land near Sandwich for $7,000 and took back on it a mortgage to Mrs. Riley for $5,000, Riley's name not being mentioned in the mortgage. As this mortgage was Mrs. Riley's, it belonged to her natural heir, Mr. Sadler. He was surprised to learn that Riley, acting as administrator, had discharged the mortgage. He arrived here to-day, and a brief investigation has already convinced him that he is entitled to considerable property from the estate. There are some curious features, as, for instance, Riley swore that his wife left an estate valued at only $75. Riley is the man who had the trouble recently with Mr. Sol. White. The latter now has a complaint against Mr. Riley for perjury in an assault case.

The constituencies under the new Redistribution Act, now before the Provincial Legislature, average about 2,500 votes each. The arrangement has been so equitably made that little exception is taken, even by members of the Opposition.

The flood at Selkirk has almost completely subsided. The water is falling rapidly, and no further danger is apprehended. The ice in the Assiniboine near this city still continues badly jammed, and the C. P. R. have had a large force of men employed in strengthening the St. James and Osborne street bridges. In the Red River the water is falling rapidly.

Cameron, the absconding Union Bank teller, is now in Minneapolis. He has instituted an action for $10,000 damages against the Sheriff of Pembina County for false detention. He also charges the Sheriff with retaining money taken from his person, amounting to upwards of $400.

In the Legislature this afternoon the final reading of the Redistribution Bill was carried. Speaker Glass moved for the retention of St. Clements constituency, but this was voted down. Mr. Norquay's motion for a separate division for Gimli was also defeated. The Bills providing for the construction of the Red River Valley Railway and authorizing a Provincial loan of $150,000 were read the third time. The House sat till 7 o'clock and adjourned until Monday.

The Traffic Over Brooklyn Bridge.

On the great Brooklyn bridge the cars begin to run at 6 a.m. Even before that hour the promenade has echoed with hurrying feet. Seventy-five thousand New Yorkers use Brooklyn as a bed chamber, and they get back early to the work-a-day world. By half-past 7 a.m. 200 persons a minute are passing through the gate bars and dropping tickets in the glass boxes. These are busy times for the gatekeepers, the train hands, the switchmen and the policemen. Three cars start every minute and a half, and in that time are packed with the tons of humanity, and this is kept up for two solid hours. After half-past 9 a.m. the volume of car travel falls from 12,000 to 6,000 an hour. It holds this average until 4 p.m., when the tide flows backward. And the crush at night is greater than the crush in the morning. The daily average on the Bridge road is 90,060 passengers. Its yearly receipts are $769,000. But there are hundreds of thousands who use the promenade.

An examination of the proposed site of the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal is being made by direction of the Provincial Board of Health to ascertain whether its proximity to the city reservoirs will endanger the purity of the water.

A ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

A Young Girl to Marry a Man Jilted by Her Mother Years Ago.

An Atlanta (Ga) despatch says: Miss Mary Jameson, a pretty 18-year-old girl, whose home is in Clayton county, Georgia, departed for Waco, Texas, where she will become the wife of Mr. Simpson Mann, one of the wealthiest planters of that section. In 1868 Mann was one of the most popular young farmers in the county. He was engaged to be married to the daughter of a neighbor, whose hand was sought by many others. The day for the marriage was set and the guests invited. Unfortunately for him, Mann espoused the Republican party, which was in much odium at the time. Not only did the lady's father object to the marriage of his daughter with a Republican, but the young lady herself declared her purpose never to wed one whose sympathies could be with the party in power. When the wedding day came it was a rival—Henry Jameson, and not Mann, who stood up as the groom. The rejected suitor sold out his possessions and moved to Texas, where he has grown rich, while the lady who was to have been his bride has become the mother of an interesting family, the eldest of whom is Miss Mary. A year ago Mann revisited the old scene, still single and with a heart susceptible to love. He saw in Mary the image of her mother when he lost her in 1868. He conceived the singular idea of having his old sweetheart for a mother-in-law. The daughter consented and the marriage was to take place this week. A telegram from Texas told of a serious accident to her lover which prevented his coming to Georgia, and asked her to go there. The brave girl at once decided to go, and is now on her way.

BRAVE MRS. MUNSON.

Charging Trespassing Cow Tagging Officials With a Pitchfork.

There is a great stir among the owners of cows in Queen's County. Under the Act of Congress, adopted by the Legislature of this State in 1887, Inspector Law, of the Bureau of Animal Industry, is making things lively. One case has just occurred which will bring up the question of the constitutionality of the law under which cows are "tagged," as it is termed.

Jake Munson is a well-known resident of Maspeth and keeps a cow or two. Sub-Inspectors Smith and Crown went to Jake's place to tag the cows. The tag consists of a piece of brass containing a number. Through the brass a copper wire is run The inspector carries a pair of nippers like shoemakers use to punch holes in leather with these nippers a hole is punched in the ear of the cow and through it the copper wire is passed, the ends of it then being twisted so as to hold the tag fast. The object of the tag is to identify the cow wherever it may go, so that the spread of pleuro-pneumonia may be prevented.

When the inspectors reached Jake's dwelling he was absent. But Mrs. Munson was very much there, too much, as it turned out, for the inspectors. As soon as the lady knew the object of the visit she placed herself in front of the cow stable like Ajax defying the lightning, and said:

"Look a here! You can't come inside this stable without tackling me."

The inspectors pulled out a circular two feet long and read it at the defender of her cows, but it didn't make her quake a bit and she told them they might bring a hundred yards of the same sort of rigmarole and she wouldn't care a snap for it or them.

"Why, it's an Act of Congress, signed by the President of the United States and approved by the Legislature of this State and Governor Hill," said Inspector Jim Smith.

"If it was George Washington's cocked hat, I wouldn't give a darn for it," was the reply.

"Well, ma'am," said the inspector, "we don't want to hurt you——"

"Hurt me!" exclaimed the lady seizing a pitchfork; "I'd like to see the likes o you attempt to hurt me. I'd make holes in you worse 'an ye ever made in the ear of a poor harmless cow."

"Let me expostulate, Mrs. Munson, said the inspector.

"'Postulate off'n the premises in quick sticks," said Mrs. Munson, "or it'll be worse for you."

The inspectors thought it safest to retire, and they went to Al Pettit's saloon to inquire after some Dutch courage. Presently Jake came along and the inspectors told him that they had been to his place to tag the cows, but that his wife had refused to allow them to enter the stable, and they had refrained from using violence out of regard for his wife.

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Jake, "that's a good 'un. I'll go and cheer up the old woman."

The inspectors followed Jake and again attempted to enter the stable. Mr. Munson seized the ready pitchfork and charged upon them, and they fled ignominiously. The inspectors got out a warrant against Munson and his wife for interfering with them in the discharge of their duties as officers of the State, and the matter is to come up before Justice McKenna at Newtown. Lawyer William E. Slocum, for the defendants, will raise the question whether the inspectors can, under the law, exercise the right to enter upon private property and mutilate the chattels of a citizen.—Brooklyn Citizen.

A Dog Who Stole Newspapers.

"A paper carrier came to me one day and told me that somebody was stealing his papers left on a certain doorstep every morning before the subscriber got a chance to see them," said a policeman the other day. "The gentleman living in the house had, it appeared, hauled the carrier over the coals and accused him of not giving him his paper. I concluded to watch the house and see who it was that was stealing the papers, for I was satisfied that the carrier was telling the truth. The next morning I saw the carrier throw the paper in the yard, and I concealed myself on the opposite side of the street to await developments. In a few minutes I saw a big black Newfoundland dog climb over the fence from the adjoining yard and pick up the paper in his mouth. He then jumped over the same fence and ran through to the back yard. The next morning I waited for the canine thief and gave him a reprimand with my club, and ever after that he let the papers alone."—Chicago Tribune.

Where Boots Are Not Cleaned.

If you come out on a ranch you must not expect to be valeted and put to bed, and dressed and shaved, and your boots polished, and your clothes brushed, and so on, in the morning. One fellow came to stay with me out there under something of that impression, and the first evening he put out his boots. In the morning he came down in his stockings—by-the-bye, he had seemed much surprised over night to hear there was no regulation hour for breakfast—and asked about his boots. I called Ah Sin. He had not seen them, he said at first, but at last a happy idea struck him. "Me sabee. Me see little dog—him ketch heapy boot in him mouth." The fact was that one of my young dogs had run away with the boots to play with them, and we never recovered anything but the heel of one of them—we were not sure which! My guest had expected a knock at his door: "Hot water, sir! Boots, sir!"—Murray's Magazine.

SOE DEFIES FLAMES.

A Spiritualistic Medium who Stood the Fire Test.

On a recent evening, in Cincinnati, Mrs. Isa Wilson Porter gave what is known among her spiritualistic brethren as "the fire test," at Greenwood Hall, before an audience of about 300 people. A committee, consisting of Dr. W. F. Work, Col. J. W. Andrews, Dr. S. E. Hyndham, Prof. Edgar Beall and Dr. L. A. Querner, were chosen to go upon the stage and inspect the lady and report upon the result of her performances. The members of the committee took chairs around the table and the lady walked forward, taking a position behind it. First she washed her hands in a bowl of ice water. Then she reached out her two pulses, which were grasped and felt carefully by two committeemen on either side of her. This over, the lady sat down and began to toy with two lighted lamps, talking in some unknown gibberish. A lady beside the reporter said it was the lingo of the ancent fire-worshippers, but it sounded very much like the language used by nurses "just landed" when talking to babies not old enough to announce their vernacular. Mrs. Porter handled the red-hot lamp chimneys, passed her hands and arms slowly over the flames of the lamps and finally took the hand of her little daughter and held that limb over the blaze for quite a while, the child evincing no sign of discomfort. She passed cards, black and white paper, a celluloid collar and other articles of a perishable nature through the devouring flames, which did not devour worth a cent, and brought the articles out all right without a singe or a bruise, admid the claps of the audience and the smiles of the committee. She filled a dish with alcohol and lighted it, and talking Sanscrit at a high rate basked her tender wrists and rotund arms in the red-hot flames, and showed up without a scar or even a pimple. The committee told the audience it was wonderful. One of them said that her arms showed an excitation of 78 and 98 degrees—quite an irregularity—before the test commenced. It must not be forgotten that Mrs. Porter daring her experiments held a lamp chimney, in which an inch and a half flame flared almost to the top against her cheek for fully two minutes without singeing a hair. None of the committee were prepared to tell whether Mrs. Porter used antidotal chemicals on her limbs to guard against being burned.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Watch Dials Made by Photography.

Watch dials are now made by photography at a mere fraction of their former cost. They all used to be painted by hand. Now a hundred are made in the time formerly required to produce one, and each of the hundred is better than the one would have been. The dial is copper, covered with enamel. Upon that they lay a sensitized coating of albumen and bichromate of potash. A large drawing, say twelve inches in diameter, of the design, figures and dots that it is desired to put upon the dial is photographed down to the required size, which makes it so fine that whatever inaccuracies may have been in the drawing are almost beyond discovery by the microscope. The negative thus made is exposed to the light in contact with the gelatine coated watch dial for from three to five minutes. Electric light is just as good as sunlight. Where the light has acted the gelatine is made insoluble. The dial is now inked over with common lithographic transfer ink. Next, with a clean sponge moistened with a little gum water, the ink and gelatine are wiped off the dial from all parts except where the light has acted, and to those it adheres, leaving the designs in clear black upon the enameled plate. But that design would easily blur and rub off by wear. Another process is necessary to make it permanent. A metallic enamel powder of any color desired—black, blue, red, green, or purple—is dusted upon the dial. It sticks to the inked portions, but nowhere else. Then the dial is put in the muffle and fired. The enamel powder melts into the white enamel base, and the work is complete. The Waltham Watch Company paid $2,000 for that process. By it they can turn out for 10 cents each dials that in the old way of making would have cost $1 apiece.—New York Sun.

What a Jungle Really Is.

By the way, we have now been the whole length of India, from Calcutta to Peshawan, and back to Bombay, on the other side of the land, and, except at the foot of the Himalayas, have not seen a single forest or indeed what we would call a wood. Trees there are everywhere along the roads—along the hedgerows, scattered about the fields and plains and dotted over the hills and mountains, but nothing like what the most of us at home have supposed to constitute an Indian jungle. All uncultivated or waste lands are called "jungles." "Out in the jungle" means about the same thing here as with us to say "out on the prairies"—that is, on the unenclosed lands, whether bare or in heavy grass. The "mountain jungles," where the tiger has his home and from which he comes down to carry off people or domestic animals, have no trees other than low, scattered bushes. On these no native thinks of going alone at night or even by day in some of them.—Carter Harrison in Chicago Mail.

A Salvation Army Romance.

The Port Hope Guide relates the following: "The bartender of the Queen's Hotel, Millbrook, was love-struck on a cadet of the Salvation Army, but said cadet would have none of him unless he joined the Army. So on Sunday night last the liquor-mixer went forward as a seeker, and professed conversion. This was enough, for on Monday morning the whiskey-slinger and his lady lover left for parts unknown."

DOMINION PARLIAMENT

Sir Adolphe Caron presented a return containing a statement of the total amount disbursed by the Government in consequence of the Northwest rebellion.

Mr. Thompson introduced a Bill respecting the advertising of counterfeit money. He explained that the object of the Bill was to attach penalties to the advertising of counterfeit money.

The Bill was read a first time.

Mr. Carling, in answer to the inquiries of Sir Richard Cartwright, said the efforts of the Government had been directed to the prevention as far as possible of the shipment of unsuitable immigrants to Canada, with very good success. Precautions to this end are taken by the Dominion agents at European ports.

After Recess

The following Bills were read the third time and passed :

To ncorporate the Dominion Plate Glass Insurance Company.

To incorporate the Buffalo, Chippawa & Niagara Falls Steamboat and Tramway Company.

To authorize the construction of bridges over the Assiniboine River at Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie for railway and passenger purposes.

Mr. McCarthy moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He explained that the Bill proposed simply to change the form of ballot used in voting in elections for or against the Act or for or against repeal, so that there will be less confusion incurred by the voter in casting his ballot.

Mr. Tisdale, in committee, said that the result of the repeal vote in seven counties in Ontario a few days ago had brought into existence an anomalous state of things, namely, that the Scott Act will be in force in those counties for a year to come, during which time no licenses can issue. He moved an amendment to the Bill to the effect that the order-in-council bringing the Act into force shall be revoked within thirty days of the time when a majority vote for repeal shall have been secured. His observation of the operation of the Act in his own county was that it had done more harm than good.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. Fisher moved that no petition for a revocation of the order-in-council declaring the Canada Temperance Act in force shall be submitted earlier than fifteen days before the expiration of three years from the date of such order-in-council.

The amendment was adopted and the Bill was reported from the committee.

Mr. Jamieson, in moving for the second reading of the Bill to amend the Act, said that similar amendments had been asked for during the past three years. He then explained the clauses of the Bill and hoped they would be passed this year. He had been charged with inconsistency by the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), but asked what had that gentleman ever done for temperance. When the vote was taken on prohibition at the last session of Parliament he had shirked it.

Mr. Mills—I was present and voted against prohibition.

Mr. Jamieson, continuing said he had voted against Mr. Mills' motion for the Scott amendment, not because it implied want of confidence in the Government, but because it was contrary to the understanding with the Dominion Alliance that all temperance measures should emanate from that source.

Mr. Fisher denied that there was any such understanding, and claimed that Mr. Jamieson was not sustained in his view at the last meeting of the Alliance.

Mr. O'Brien said that before the House was asked to give exceptional legislation for the measure, which certainly did not occupy the same position as it did some time ago, temperance men should settle their quarrels between themselves. The Scott Act was defeated recently because the people were determined not to submit to tyrannical legislation. The people had voted against this sort of spiritual declamation of the Women's Christian Temperance Unions and certain clergymen. It was a mistake to try to make total abstainers by law. The result of the Scott Act was more drinking, more liquor selling and more false swearing. Under the circumstances this legislation should not be further extended. He moved that the Bill be read this day six months.

Mr. Mills (Bothwell) declared that Mr. Jamieson had supported the anti-temperance candidate in South Lanark. The position of Mr. Jamieson was evidently that it would be against his principle to support his principles against his party.

Mr. Freeman said Mr. Mills was trying to put himself in the position of leader of the temperance party in the House. He would like to know the hon. gentleman's record before he accepted him as leader.

Mr. Jamieson denied that he had supported the hon. member for South Lanark.

Mr. Haggart moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Bain (Wentworth) said that if temperance Conservatives would stiffen the backs of their representatives they would accomplish something for their cause. He quoted a speech of Mr. Foster in 1885, when he declared that it was necessary that the Government should keep faith with the country and make the Act workable. He could admire any man who changed his opinion and advocated another side of the question, but he despised a man who sold himself for a position and went back on the principles that had made him, and became a traitor to the cause which had warmed him into existence. Until a man's faith in temperance was strong enough to induce him to vote for what he thinks to be right, temperance men were not going to accomplish much in Canada.

Mr. Casey said the Scott Act had been a failure in St. Thomas, and more liquor had been consumed since its adoption than before. He would, however, support the second reading of the Bill.

The House divided on Mr. Haggart's motion for the adjournment of the debate, which was lost by, yeas 44, nays 88.

Mr. O'Brien withdrew his motion for the six months' hoist.

The Bill was read a second time.

Sir Richard Cartwright said that tomorrow he would draw the attention of the Government to certain irregularities in the Kingston post-office.

The House adjourned at 1.25 a.m.

Sir Richard Cartwright called the attention of the Government to the defalcations in the Kingston post-office. He said there had been complaints of robberies and lately William Shannon, deputy postmaster, who was caught in the act of feloniously opening a letter, was allowed to escape, as no action was taken for twenty-four hours. This looked like miscarriage of justice. He would be glad to hear an explanation, and would like to know if there had been other robberies, and he thought the Government should make good the losses.

Mr. McLelan admitted there had been a want of promptness. Shannon was an old and highly respected officer. Of the three letters, one contained twenty-five cents and the other two contained no money. The inspector to whom the matter was reported, deferred action, but as soon as he informed the department instructions were issued to take proceedings against Shannon. He had, however, at that time left the country.

Mr. Wilson (Elgin) regarded the explanation as most unsatisfactory, but thought that the cause of the leniency could be readily explained. The postmaster evidently thought this man was the Shannon that assisted Sir John Macdonald in 1874, but finding he was not the same man an order was given for his arrest.

Sir John Macdonald said the hon. member for Elgin was barking up the wrong tree. It looked as if there had been an arrangement between him and Sir Richard Cartwright to hang a malignant attack upon this circumstance. The defaulting Shannon was not a friend of his. Before the matter was reported to the Postmaster-General the bird had flown.

Mr. Rykert drew the attention of the House to the case of Mrs. Gowanlock whose husband was killed by the Indians during the late rebellion. The claim of Mrs. Gowanlock for compensation was rejected by the Government on the ground that her husband at the time he was murdered was not in the employ of the Government. The husband of Mrs. Delaney, who was killed at the same time, was an employee of the Government and his widow was granted an indemnity. He thought common justice and humanity would suggest that Mrs. Gowanlock, who suffered equally with Mrs. Delaney and who is in needy circumstances, should receive the same compensation, apart altogether from the disputed question as to whether or not he was in the Government employ.

Messrs. Wright and Barron supported the claim of Mrs. Gowanlock.

Sir John Macdonald quite agreed with all that had been said as to the sad circumstances surrounding this case. The Government would be glad to relieve all such cases of need, but nothing could be done without the sanction of Parliament. Mr. Gowanlock was not in any sense an employee of the Government, but had simply entered into a contract with the Government, by which he was to receive a bonus of $1,500 on condition that he would erect and maintain a Government mill for the use of the Indians. It would be a very agreeable duty on the part of the Government to propose a pension for Mrs. Gowanlock, if they were assured that such was the desire of the House.

Mr. Laurier said he thought Parliament would not grudge a vote to Mrs. Gowanlock, apart from the question of employ. He thought this lady had as good a claim for compensation as any person who has had any property destroyed in consequence of the rebellion.

Sir John Macdonald said this was opening a very wide door.

Mr. Laurier said there was a special reason for granting compensation for losses sustained during the late rebellion, since the outbreak was caused by the mismanagement of the Government. He referred also to the Kingston post-office defalcations and censured the Government inspector for not having had Shannon arrested on the discovery of his guilt.

Mr. Lister drew attention to the fact that the postmaster at Arkona, Ont., had recently been removed without notice and a Conservative had been put in his place. No charge of irregularity was ever brought against the old postmaster, and yet he believed many postmasters who were behind in their accounts were retained in office.

Mr. McLelan said the postmaster was dismissed because the inspector represented that he had ceased to be a resident of the place.

Mr. Lister asked the Postmaster-General if he had not retained postmasters in office whom he knew were behind in their balances.

Mr. McLelan intimated that such was the case in some instances, but said a vigorous effort was being made to have all accounts squared by the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Somerville said the Minister did not always adhere to the rule that a postmaster should be a resident. A vacancy recently occurred in Plattsville, in his constituency, which was filled by a mere boy from a distant part of the riding, a son of his defeated opponent, and in opposition to the unanimous wish of the people.

Mr. Mills said postmasters had been removed in many instances on account of their political leanings. Very grave irregularities had grown up in connection with the management of the post-office generally.

Sir Richard Cartwright said it was poor satisfaction to the people of Kingston that the Postmaster-General had no better explanation to offer for the circumstance that a felon had been allowed to escape to another country and the ends of justice had been defeated.

The House went into Committee of Supply.

After passing several items the committee rose

A Modern David.

St. Thomas always was a queer town. A heifer which was being driven along Elm street to the slaughter house of a local butcher yesterday became wild and made after a lad named Henry Palmer. Instead of taking to his heels young Palmer, profiting by the example of David when he slew Goliath, picked up a stone and threw it at the animal. The stone struck the heifer squarely in the forehead and felled her like an ox, and, according to John W. Cook, who was present on the scene, death followed the blow.—St. Thomas Times.

It is probable Manitoba will not hold a Provincial Exhibition this year.

In a duel in the Bois de Boulogne, Paris, yesterday between MM. Dupuis and Hobert Artoieties, the former was killed.

CATARRH IN THE HEAD.

SYMPTOMS OF THE DISEASE.—Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a "nasal twang"; the breath is offensive; smell and taste impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians.

COMMON SENSE TREATMENT. If you would remove an evil, strike at its root. As the predisposing or real cause of catarrh is, in the majority of cases, some weakness, impurity, or otherwise faulty condition of the system, in attempting to cure the disease our chief aim must be directed to the removal of that cause. The more we see of this odious disease, and we treat successfully thousands of cases annually at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, the more do we realize the importance of combining with the use of a local, soothing and healing application, a thorough and persistent internal use of blood-cleansing and tonic medicines.

CHIEF RELIANCE. In curing catarrh and all the various diseases with which it is so frequently complicated, as throat, bronchial, and lung diseases, weak stomach, catarrhal deafness, weak or inflamed eyes, impure blood, scrofulous and other taints, the wonderful powers and virtues of Dr Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cannot be too strongly extolled. It has a specific effect upon the lining mucous membranes of the nasal and other air-passages, promoting the natural secretion of their follicles and glands, thereby softening the diseased and thickened membrane, and restoring it to its natural, thin, delicate, moist, healthy condition. As a blood-purifier, it is unsurpassed. As those diseases which complicate catarrh are diseases of the lining mucous membranes, or of the blood, it will readily be seen why this medicine is so well calculated to cure them.
